Short leet challenge

There were flutters in the dovecotes at the University Club, in Edinburgh, last Friday during lunchtime, when senior members of that sociable institution mulled over a story in The Scotsman. This purported to leak the short leet (or list) for the principalship of Edinburgh University. Professor Berrick Soul (who is vice-chancellor designate of the University of York) has been acting principal since the death of Sir Hugh Robson last year.

If The Scotsman is to be believed, the front running candidate is Professor A. J. Youngson, director of the School of Social Sciences at Canberra, Australia, and a former Edinburgh vice-principal. He is said to be closely followed by "another strong challenger", none other than Sir James Hamilton, permanent secretary at the Department of Education and Science, who "might have considerable influence in higher education circles". (An attempt to elicit a comment from Sir James failed, but this neither confirms nor denies the accuracy of the report.)

Other names mentioned were: Sir John Butterfield (58), regius professor of physic at Cambridge; R. B. Duthie (53), professor of orthopaedic surgery at Oxford; J. H. Horlock, FRS (50), vice-chancellor of Salford University; Henry Harris, FRS (53), professor of pathology at Oxford; Ralph B. Raphael (56), incorrectly described as vice-chancellor of Oxford; Sir Peter Swinnerton-Dyer, FRS (51), professor of mathematics at Cambridge; Sir Denys Wilkinson, FRS (56), vice-chancellor of Sussex University.

A notable absentee from the list is John P. Mackintosh, Labour MP for Berwick and East Lothian, the distinguished professor of politics at Edinburgh who doubles an active (and independent) existence at Westminster with heading a department at the university. It seems that the same independence of mind and freedom of speech which he exercises at Westminster, and which has never endeared him to Sir Harold Wilson or Mr James Callaghan, has also rubbed senior academics up the wrong way.

Since the time of Sir Michael Swan, who was principal in the sixties, Edinburgh has come to prefer diplomacy and discretion to outspokenness and abrasive wit.

Storm in a creche

Reports are reaching us of an exceedingly ill-tempered brouhaha surrounding the future of the campus crèche at Warwick University. "Nobody has actually hit anybody yet", said one such despatch, "but it is becoming rather nasty. People are getting red in the face and shouting at each other, or speaking through clenched teeth."

These melodramatic reactions accompany accusations of sexism on the one hand, and counter-charges that the faction proposing expansion of the crèche at considerable expense wishes to act illegally and mis-spend public funds.

The fuss is all about an ambitious proposal put forward by an organized group of academic staff and the students' union that a crèche and playgroup should be provided free of charge, not only for the children of students but for all employees of the university. The playgroup would operate during school holidays and at half-term, as well as during term for the time which the university works beyond school hours.

Provisional costing carried out in the registry, at the request of the Senate committee, suggests that this would cost somewhere in the region of £16,000 a year, although it could vary, depending on demand, at anything between £12,000 and £20,000.

Opponents of the scheme, not unreasonably, have been asking why academic and library staff should expect to get this service totally free. The answer was provided by one woman with a child under her chair at an academic meeting, who said "We have a right to carry on with our careers."

At present the university runs a crèche for 15 children aged from six months to five years, and charges £12 a week or £1.20 for a half-day session. Later this month, Senate will consider plans to expand to 35 children, using space in Coventry College of Education which recently merged with the university (and which will, presumably, want its share of places). For school-age children there is a summer holiday playgroup financed by fees and a grant from Coventry Council.

The crèche was originally set up to help students who became pregnant, so that they could continue their studies. Children of students still get priority, and other places can be taken up by university staff. There is only a tiny waiting list, but this could simply mean that staff have made other, possibly more expensive, arrangements. Fees are waived in cases of hardship, which presumably applies only to students, and the current annual subsidy for each child works out at £200, or a total of around £3,000.

The university prefers not to talk about financing and the reason for this also explains the major stumbling block to expansion proposals. All universities are under clear instructions from the University Grants Committee not to use recurrent funds for child care. These instructions are issued every time anyone asks, and people have asked regularly because Warwick is not the only university dissatisfied with the current position.

What some do is to provide a crèche out of UGC money under the heading "student welfare". This is regarded by university administrators as something that can be got away with, but most do not want to make too much fuss about it, in case something goes wrong. Universities, like other public or semi-public bodies, stand in proper awe of the Public Accounts Committee, and do not wish to risk condemnation by the Comptroller and Auditor General for misapplication of public funds and a consequent reduction in grant.

The Warwick case is an extreme one, since a resolution passed by the student union, and endorsed with a large majority last March by Assembly (which includes all academic and senior library and administrative staff), sought pressure by the university on the UGC, the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, and the DES, to alter the policy on provision of such funds by 1979.

The university has chosen to meet this challenge in a manner easily arranged by any organization with a suitably elaborate structure. The Assembly motion went to Senate and Council, the bodies dealing with academic and administrative policy respectively. They put it on one side pending the appointment of a university committee to deal with all aspects of child care. Senate and Council then set up a working party to decide whether such a committee was needed. The working party has not yet reported.

Whose hand on the rewrite

In The Times on Tuesday, Peter Hennessey reported that Dr Bernard Donoughue, the Prime Minister's special adviser, "rewrote the Green Paper on Education". Hennessey was discussing the role of special advisers—Mrs Williams has two, John Lyttle and Stella

"It was found abandoned on the school steps with just a handful of vouchers."

Greenall—who are non-career civil servants, recruited for a maximum of five years to offer political advice and support for ministers in their departmental work.

Hennessey's titbit—which clearly came from Dr Donoughue himself—needs to be qualified before it suddenly becomes a piece of instant history. It is not a version of events which goes unchallenged at the DES, where the final hand is believed to have been that of Sir James Hamilton.

Of course, the question of the final authorship of a document which passes through so many hands is a metaphysical one (and of no great interest), but it is important that the Donoughue claim should not get on the record and stay there simply because none of the other civil servants concerned can contradict it.

Buy your own school

Buy-it-yourself seems to be the latest parental answer to school closures. Last week there was the Kent couple who coughed up £20,000 to keep their daughter's private school going. This week parents in Madingley, a village in Cambridgeshire, have decided to make a bid for their voluntary-aided C of E primary school, which is scheduled to close at the end of term.

The building, currently catering for 23 children, is held in trust by the Ely Diocesan Board of Finance. Until recently the parents, who failed in their fight to keep the school open, hoped to persuade the board to allow them to run the school themselves. (A full account of the campaign, written by Rick Rogers, former editor of Where, appears in the latest edition of Vole magazine, published yesterday, price 60p).

But now the board has put the building up for auction. John King, chairman of the Madingley Parents' Association and a valuer by profession, says it is likely to be a couple of months before the auction takes place. Can the parents on that long, with their child future in the balance? Appa there is no other building i village suitable for use as a although "the village hall just do for a term".

The parents have not bee tirely happy with the board's formance. "We're not satisfied all the legal procedures were plied with", John King says appears that the church just the money from the sale building. It has caused a amount of ill-feeling."

DO YOU CHECK YOUR CHANGE?

When Mr Pennywise went shopping he always checked his change. One day he bought eight articles at a store, at a total cost between £1 and £10. He noticed that the amount he owed in pence was a multiple of 8, and that the sum of its three digits was 8. He handed the cashier some pound notes, and was given 52p change. Being an honest man, he pointed out that he had been given too much change: the correct amount he knew was also a multiple of 8, which 52 was not!

LUCKY SEVEN

George Graham Green was born on the seventh day of the seventh month. When he discovered that G was the seventh letter of the alphabet, he concluded that 7 must be his lucky number, so he tried to buy a car with registration letters GGG and a number which was a multiple of 7, such as GGG 777. As this was unobtainable, he looked for a number that was a multiple of 7 and whose digits added up to 7. How many numbers would suit his purpose, apart from GGG 7 and GGG 70?

As an alternative he thought of looking for an old crock, such as GG 7000, with a four digit number. How many such numbers are multiples of 7 and have a digit sum of 7?

PLAYING CARDS AND NUMBER PATTERNS

The numbers from 1 to 10 are represented on playing cards by symmetrical patterns, but court cards—Jacks, Queens and Kings—have values corresponding to 11, 12 and 13. There are many patterns for these numbers greater than 10, some of which are shown above; which of them are equivalent (a) to Jacks, (b) to Queens, (c) to Kings?

Which of the above patterns have (i) one line of symmetry, (ii) two lines of symmetry, (iii) rotational symmetry?

There are alternative symmetrical patterns for all numbers greater than 1. For example, the patterns of the "Triangular Numbers" 3, 6 and 10 are triangular, and all the multiples of 4 can be represented by "square" patterns. Invent some patterns of your own for the numbers from 6 to 13, which have one line of symmetry, two lines of symmetry, or rotational symmetry.

CORRECTION

The final section of WHAT COMES NEXT? published on May 5 was garbled. This should have read: (d) What comes next in the sequence that begins 3, 4, ...?

The answer appears in Solutions May 5.

D. B. E

SOLUTIONS

CHANGE: Correct change 48p, 76p, 60p, 88p more … In only two cases is the amount of change (as expected by Mr Pennywise) a multiple of 8. He could have bought 8 articles at an average cost of 19p each, or 8 articles at an average cost of 64p each. NOTE. If 100x+10y+z is a multiple of 8, and x+y+z=8, it can be proved that 2x+y is also a multiple of 8, and so (x, y) is either (1, 6), (2, 4), (3, 2) or (4, 0).

LUCKY 7: 133, 322, 511, 700, 1015, 1141, 1204, 1330, 2023, 2212, 2401, 3031, 3220, 4102, 5110.

PLAYING cards and number patterns—Jacks (11) are represented by A, E, F; Queens (12) by C, G, I; and Kings (13) by B, D, H. (i) E has one line of symmetry, (ii) A, B, C, D, F, G, H, have two lines of symmetry, (iii) I has rotational symmetry.

It's not what they say, it's the way they say it. Three slogans from the continuing milk battle.

Milk offer spurned by counties

by Lucy Hodges

A vigorous advertising campaign by the National Dairy Council and pleas from the Government have failed to touch the hearts of at least five county councils, the first to have openly decided not to take up the EEC subsidy and extend free school milk to junior pupils.

The five councils expressed their views forcibly to dairy industry representatives last week at a London meeting which coincided with a series of full-page advertisements giving the milkmen's view. Ironically, the most spirited defence of the county councils' position came from Mr John Horrell, chairman of the education committee of the Association of County Councils, who owns a herd of cattle in Cambridgeshire, and whose brother runs a big dairy business.

The counties' reasons for rejecting the subsidy are mainly financial. They argue that the Rate Support Grant gives them a raw deal compared with metropolitan authorities. And from April 1979 onwards l.e.a.s will have to make up the cost of giving all seven to 11-year-olds free milk after the EEC subsidy and RSG money is taken into account.

Many councils have calculated that they will have to find well over £100,000 to implement the programme. Some have decided they would rather spend such a sum, if they had it, on more teachers or a policy of greater priority. It is no coincidence that these authorities any people would agree with the elementary ithmetic of teacher training set out by the tional Association of Teachers in Further and gher Education (page 3) that three plus one not add up to four.

There has been no shortage of voices (many, e NATFHE, representing the old college terests) to proclaim that the "three plus one" iversity postgraduate certificate pattern of itial training cannot begin to cover the profesonal ground of a four or even three-year BEd urse, particularly for teachers going into imary and middle schools. On present plans, of all initial teacher training is to be by courses. It would be unfortunate, NATFHE y, if the PGCE route were allowed gradually to crease its share of the action.

They believe that the three year non-honours should be abandoned, and the four-year BEd up to improve its currency and maintain of the market. Whatever the merits of argument—and there have been plenty of plaints about the professional preparation for offered in colleges, what with the mands of main subject courses and the dominance of courses in abstract education theory—task of improving the currency of the BEd ts pretty formidable.

As new options in higher education develop th the merger and diversification of the remaining colleges into less specialist institutions, the is likely to be an increasingly unattractive for two A-level students of even moderate ility.

Last year, only 58 per cent of entrants to initial ining had two A levels, and 81 per cent one. By 0, all entrants will need two A levels. This tember, it will be touch and go whether there be applicants enough to fill available places three and four-year education courses. But the lications for PGCE courses look healthy.

Doing away with the three-year course would throw the BEd even further into the deep end of the general honours degree pool. In theory, that might make for a better entry. In practice, the attraction of a four-year BEd over a general honours degree with the option of a postgraduate year always open, could be limited. And, when the prospects of teaching jobs, even in shortage subjects, are so unpredictable what careers adviser would steer students to the specialist education degrees?

The crucial question is not how to shore up the BEd, but how to improve the postgraduate courses. The whole dilemma was well foreseen by the James Committee, and its solutions still hold. If the PGCE brigades are to be prepared for a reasonable range of jobs in schools, they need more than nine months' training.

The Green Paper's noises about "more comprehensive arrangements" for the induction year should rapidly be translated into action and the PGCE courses should be dovetailed into training and support on the job.

This will undoubtedly demand radical rethinking of courses by some traditional university departments, and a high level of cooperation with l.e.a.s. But it is the only way of making sense of the rapidly approaching time when more than half of all entrants to teaching will come in by the postgraduate route.

Meanwhile, there is general agreement that two plus two definitely makes four, and all possible support should be given to the colleges who can attract students on the basis of two years' general higher education, and two years' professional training.

Beyond the common core

As the wheels roll on slowly towards the reform of the secondary school examination system—the Waddell report goes to the examination boards on Monday—the attempt by Her Majesty's Inspectorate to generate a general discussion of the idea of a core curriculum seems to have been overtaken by more practical haggling over administration.

What is likely to happen is that the process of rationalizing the examination system will involve a greater amount of coordination in the content to which different subject labels are attached. The more exotic options will be circumscribed. A few horns will be drawn in here, some excesses curtailed there. The traditional function of the examination system as a control mechanism for the secondary curriculum will be re-asserted. There will be a bit more centralization (but hopefully not too much), a bit more efficiency (but hopefully not too much) and a bit more dullness too (but hopefully not too much).

Where in this does the HMI's discussion document on Curriculum 11-16 now stand? Many copies of the document have been circulated to schools. How lively has the discussion been? It is clear from the TES correspondence columns that it has not aroused as much interest as, say, the N and F proposals. A clue to the reason why may be gleaned from an article on pages six and seven, in which Bob Doe reports the responses of six experienced comprehensive school heads, all deeply interested in the curricular issues of the secondary school, most of whom were profoundly unimpressed by the platitudes of Curriculum 11-16.

There are many reasons why the document fails to convince. Some of these are no fault of the HMIs. Some comprehensive school heads feel that there is too much tension between "the comprehensive principle" which underlies (in part, at least) the notion of the common core, and the refusal of the subject-specialists to surrender their concern for "academic" values and specific standards. But the HMIs are right to reflect this tension, which is real enough. To discuss every issue as if it were a matter of doctrine to be checked for orthodoxy against the comprehensive principle would not carry the debate very far.

More serious, many will think, are the doubts which hover around the main assumption of the document, that it would be desirable if everybody followed a common core curriculum for 75 per cent of the time up to 16 instead of (as now, according to the document) to 14.

By the time pupils reach the 16-plus examination the truth about differentiation becomes too obvious to be obscured by euphemisms about a common core. It may be that the reformed secondary school examination will foster illusions of unity and even succeed in postponing some differentiation. But it is not obvious that this will actually benefit those who are going to be labelled failures by any system for handing out credentials.

Youth will be served

The latest Conservative discussion paper A Time for Youth, explodes in all directions with a barrage of un-Conservative ideas (see page four). Mr Alan Hazelhurst, MP, and his colleagues have produced a document which reflects the views of some of the Conservative party's "sympathizers" in the world of organized youth. (As with Labour politicians, youth and student politics offer some political aspirants a first rung on the ladder of election office). It is, therefore, youth-orientated: it wants a designated Minister of State for Youth within a new combined Department of Education and Training—a gigantic enterprise embracing the functions now covered by the DES and the Department of Employment. And it envisages a corresponding reorganization at the local level.

Anyone who proposes bringing education and training together is entitled to a cheer, but whether this leviathan is the right instrument for the purpose is another matter. There are so many matters which the brief policy paper skates over—for example how to reconcile the different financial methods of the two government departments which would be brought together in the new Department of Education and Training, and how to modify local government financial mechanisms to take account of this. It is simply assumed that because, between them, the DES, the DE, the MSC and the l.e.a.s dispose of a lot of cash, everything will come out in the wash. The DES and the DE start from different philosophical poles, and express the values of two quite separate sets of social institutions. The document doesn't say how these are to be welded into one.

Along with these forbidding proposals for structural change, goes a plan for a universal (voluntary) training and opportunities scheme for the 16 to 18 age-group—a development of the present youth opportunities programmes which begins to look quite likely whichever party is in power; lots more student grants (with the means test abolished for the over 18s); ambitious plans for the representation of youth on public bodies (including school governors) and on refurbished local youth councils; and the sketch of a horrid plan for political education with politicians gaining access to the classroom.

It all adds up to a pamphlet which is full of obvious nonsense, but it also has some of the urgency needed to arouse dormant Conservatives to an awareness of a tiresome section of the community they would much rather forget. No doubt, had the authors tried to write a White Paper the result would have been different. Instead they have tried to let off a firecracker, in the hope that someone will take some notice.

Doubts about EITB plan

It was Mrs Williams who broke the news that the Engineering Industries Training Board was ready to amend the apprenticeship rules to enable boys and girls to start on courses leading to craft qualifications in the last two years at school.

At the time, Mrs Williams's endorsement sounded a bit premature. As presented by the EITB, the scheme offered the schools a set of very narrowly prescribed teaching assignments which would bespeak a large proportion of a pupil's time in the fourth and fifth years. Now, not surprisingly, the National Union of Teachers has begun to express some serious doubts. Raising these in the TUC Education Committee, the NUT got support from other unions and it looks as if the EITB's initiative will bring suggestions that, if there is to be a vocational course for pupils in the last two years, it should be broadly enough based to provide a foundation course for a range of industrial apprenticeships, not just for engineering.

There are clearly some important points to clear up before the matter can be taken much further. It will fall to the Manpower Services Commission to negotiate with both the training boards and the education authorities in search of some compromises. The Commission would, no doubt, welcome as broad a basic course as possible; the difficulty will be to achieve this without losing the practical advantages held out by covering in school a defined programme of work which would otherwise have to be done later.

Educating the handicapped is just one aspect of meeting children's individual needs. John Vaizey on Warnock

Special schooling for all

"I must declare an interest", as they say in Parliament, in the subject matter of the Warnock report. In my early teens I was very seriously ill and spent many years in a hospital bed, being educated in a hospital school (some of this I have described in Scenes from Institutional Life). I left there to go, after an interval, to Cambridge. I am also one of those who successfully persuaded the Government to accept Section 10 of the Education Act, 1976, which reverses the previous statutory provisions dealing with special education, making integration the norm. End of personal declaration; but it is as well to say that I feel deeply, from experience, about what Mrs Warnock has written about.

What the Warnock report represents, in my view, is a profound attempt to analyse a complex problem. The notion of "handicap" is a complex one, ranging from small (but serious) problems like mild depression or a broken arm, to spina bifida or Down's syndrome. And, reduced to its essentials, it raises the basic question of good teaching, of the organization of schools and of the education system as a whole—that is, how to assess the individual's own strengths and weaknesses, and use them in order to build stronger and better people able to function in a good society.

Put in this context, the division of "handicaps" into broad categories like "the blind", or "the retarded", is as crude as the now discarded division between children who were grammar school types and those who were good with their hands. For there are children with medically severe conditions who can cope perfectly well with most aspects of normal schooling even without any special arrangements whatsoever, and those with apparently minor medical or behavioural problems who are quite unable to cope. I fell myself into the former category; in the interval between my special school and university I went to a grammar school where no allowances whatever were made for what was a serious physical handicap; a medical request to cut the last lesson of the day was ruthlessly refused. Yet I still coped. Whereas an apparently minor difficulty could be built up, without parental or social support, into a serious case of school phobia.

The movement for the integration of the handicapped into normal schools, therefore, is really (in my case at least) a movement for treating each child as an individual, whose special needs will be sensitively met by caring teachers; and my own experience as a parent suggests to me that this is a perfectly realizable objective and one that, indeed, gives most teachers the main emotional satisfaction of their job—the feeling that they have recognized what a child needs, and provided a means of meeting that need. It may well be, however, that in many cases, for technical reasons, a "special" school, or unit, is required. Deaf children need a quiet environment where their complex technological aids can be serviced, as well as experienced teachers of the deaf; for them a balance has to be struck between this technical problem, and the advantages of the range of sports, of contact with children who can hear, and teachers who have a wide range of ordinary classroom experience, which are available in a good secondary school. But to identify the need for a special school with severity of handicap, as measured by some medical (or even social) criteria, is too simple a solution to a complex question.

The Warnock report, therefore, proposes to see special educational needs as part of the spectrum of needs that all children have, to one degree or another. It also, very properly in my view, identifies special education provision not with special schools and units, as such, but with the service of specialist help in a variety of forms to all children who can benefit from it. Thus a special education service would replace the section or division of education departments which now looks after special schools.

This is allied to a further series of important points. My own view is that the psychological sophistication of teachers—perhaps a better though less professional sounding phrase would be "sensibility"—is much greater than that of the medical and para-medical professions, especially nurses. This derives in part at least from the types person who are attracted to tea ing as a career—specifically, m of them actually seem to like chi ren—and also to their genera greater degree of intellectu sophistication, and their expos to some teaching of ba psychological skills. The orientat of the medical and para-med professions, is towards disabili it is only incidentally that they concerned with the care of child as a complex human be In my own view, therefore, the m that teachers are involved in decisions about the care of a c with a "disability", and the it is seen as a problem in medi then happiness is likely to be outcome.

This has an immediate imp upon the other most importa port in this field recently publis —the Court report on child heal That report proposed a radical organization of child health ca and specifically that there should a network of local paediatricians w would be responsible, within gene practitioner groups, for the he of the children in the families the practice. Clearly, the need such doctors, and their associ community nurses and social work ers, to be in close contact with schools is very great; and the War nock proposals only really ma effective sense in this context.

One last reflection on this ma ficent and important report. It m places a new series of duties on schools, and specifically upon tea chers. In recent years, their ha have been strained by many ad tional burdens. In addition to teach ing, say, chemistry and help out with games, they are be asked to be sensitive to the race and sexual attitude identify high flyers, to dance, and other specialisms, and to be on the lookout for social and medical problems. My own im pression is that this is done wi sensitivity and care by an ingly large number of teachers it is a heavy burden; it requires massive initial and in-service tra ing; and we must not be surprised if it occasionally fails to achie the results we ask it to.

Why the voucher system just won't work

Sir,—The publication of the Kent feasibility study on education vouchers and subsequent enquiry has led me to believe that I am one of the only two British people to have studied in situ the voucher experiment as practised in the Alum Rock Union Elementary School District in San José, California.

Having involved myself in discussion and debate, and having made a number of assertions based on little concrete evidence, I came to the conclusion in early 1977 that the only method of ascertaining the truth was to visit America in order to discover whether the system worked, and whether it was relevant to British needs.

A gruelling timetable included visits to schools, lengthy meetings and taped interviews with the district superintendent, school principals, voucher counsellors, evaluators, teachers, administrators, advisers, parents and children. I discovered that social and racial problems had existed in the area, that the school district was distressingly poor compared with most of America and much of Britain, and that the federal cash being offered in 1972 to fund a voucher scheme was recognized as a means of securing the school district against constant financial difficulty.

The additional money facilitated the establishment of community schools with local people very much involved, the employment of large numbers of additional teachers, advisers, evaluators and administrators, and substantial upgrading of the district's education undoubtedly followed. Mass education of parents was set in train in order to enable them to make sensible choices, using their vouchers, between the great variety of programmes being offered in the district, mainly in "mini-schools" within the elementary and middle schools themselves.

The original intention was not only to provide choice between programmes within schools, but further choice between schools. After 12 months, though a majority of the participating parents understood the broad outlines of the scheme, only a few children (approximately 100) exercised their right to attend non-neighbourhood schools. Parents did, however, make some choices within schools. At the end of the second year, parental interest lessened, and lack of pressure to expand schools with mobile classrooms brought agreement to fix school sizes. After three years, the concept of open enrolment had been allowed to evolve. This was modified in mid-1976 and the voucher abandoned with most of the federal money.

What remains over there are better schools than before, more administrators, more staff, more expense, but no more real choice than is offered in most parts of this country. When a school is full at Alum Rock, it is full and that is final. But like certain areas in Britain, where some choice between comprehensive primary schools and between comprehensive secondary schools is possible, and, through capitation and staffing financing, the principle of "cash following the student" is operated, open enrolment is the only practical result of a massive social and financial upheaval.

My general conclusion is that, however it is organized, good education is expensive, and although significant improvements were made at Alum Rock during the period of operation of the voucher experiment, these improvements were due to the massive injection of federal money. Since returning from the United States, I have stated that the abandonment of vouchers was inevitable due to the practical difficulties associated with buildings, transport, staff and expense. It has been calculated reliably that the introduction of a full voucher system with a surplus of school places to provide complete choice could cost 10 to 15 per cent more than a conventional system. I do not believe that any education authority in this country, or indeed any government of whatever political persuasion, would be prepared to condone this sort of increased expenditure. In my own county's Cambridgeshire [illegible] budget for [illegible] and a 15 per cent increase would be no less than £10,550,000.

I contend that the Kent document bears out all these points and that, although as a Conservative county councillor I am in a philosophical quandary on vouchers, practical considerations prohibit their implementation, and I do hope that my friends in Kent and elsewhere will show the utmost caution before proceeding from this interesting and thorough feasibility study.

Graduate training 'inadequate'

by Bert Lodge

The standard route to teaching for graduates—a degree followed by a year in a university department of education—is inadequate, the lecturers' union, NATFHE, said this week.

It recommends instead a four-year honours course of academic and professional studies for all entrants to the profession. But two A levels should not be an invariable condition of acceptance, and students having second thoughts should be able to leave after two years with a DipHE. Similarly, students from other courses who decided to switch to teacher training should be able to join the course at this point.

In a policy statement, Teacher Education, NATFHE points out that current proposals will mean that by 1981 half the new teachers each year will have qualified by the post-graduate certificate of education route.

"I find that those students are not so good at the start of their careers as those who have followed a BEd course", Mr Malcolm Lee, the association's spokesman on teacher education, said.

The policy statement also points out that the increased reliance on PGCE qualified teachers will consolidate the undesirable two-tier system of BEd courses for primary and middle school teachers and the PGCE for those going into secondary schools.

"BEd graduates and PGCE qualified are needed in both primary and secondary schools", the association says.

It suggests two A levels or their equivalent should be the normal entry standard, but says the door should not be closed to those without such qualifications. Opportunities for mature students to train for teaching should be maintained and there should be "other criteria as well as paper qualifications to ensure that those who enter teaching education offer the greatest potential as readers".

Mr Lee, a teacher trainer at Doncaster Institute of Higher Education, said O level maths should not be insisted on for all candidates at present because at some schools it was still possible to drop the subject at 13.

To meet the demand for teachers in shortage subjects, students should be admitted to courses without necessarily having an A level in the subject, provided they had done an intensive course in that area before going to college.

Qualified teachers wishing to change to a shortage subject should be entitled to secondment for a year to retrain.

The association would like to see a regular census of the teaching force to monitor supply and demand, in particular subjects. The planning and coordination of teacher education should be undertaken by regional bodies coordinated by a national council.

Rebuff on pension claim brings action warning

by Stephen Cohen

Proposals for improving teachers' pensions received a polite brush off last week from representatives of the Government and local authorities.

A "shopping list" of demands was turned down by the management side of the Teachers' Superannuation Working Party. No negotiation took place and the leader of the teachers' side, Mr Fred Jarvis, warned that the "totally negative response" would cause bitter disappointment and anger and could well lead to demands for action from teachers.

The pension scheme is run by the Government and teachers have no say in its organization. Neither do they have access to facts and figures.

The improvements requested included an increase in pensions of teachers who have retired since 1965, an increase for women teachers who left work before equal pay was fully implemented and who now receive lower pensions than men, and changes in the rules for widows.

The cost of the demands was about 0.5 per cent of the current teachers' salary bill and would also have meant an increase in pension contributions of 2.6 per cent.

The working party is due to meet again in October when the teachers will put forward the demands again coupled with further requests for improvements which will include a pension of two-thirds of final salary, reduction of teachers' contributions to nil and six-monthly revisions of pensions.

A spokesman for the Department of Education said no firm conclusion was reached at the meeting.

"The whole subject is highly complex and nothing is likely to emerge for some time", the spokesman said.

The working party did agree, however, to set up a working party. This will look at the requests for teacher involvement in the management of the pension fund. It is government policy for employees to take part in the running of their pension scheme. The Government's reason for suggesting another working party was "to secure further information on the intentions of the teachers' side".

Pay levels soon 40% down

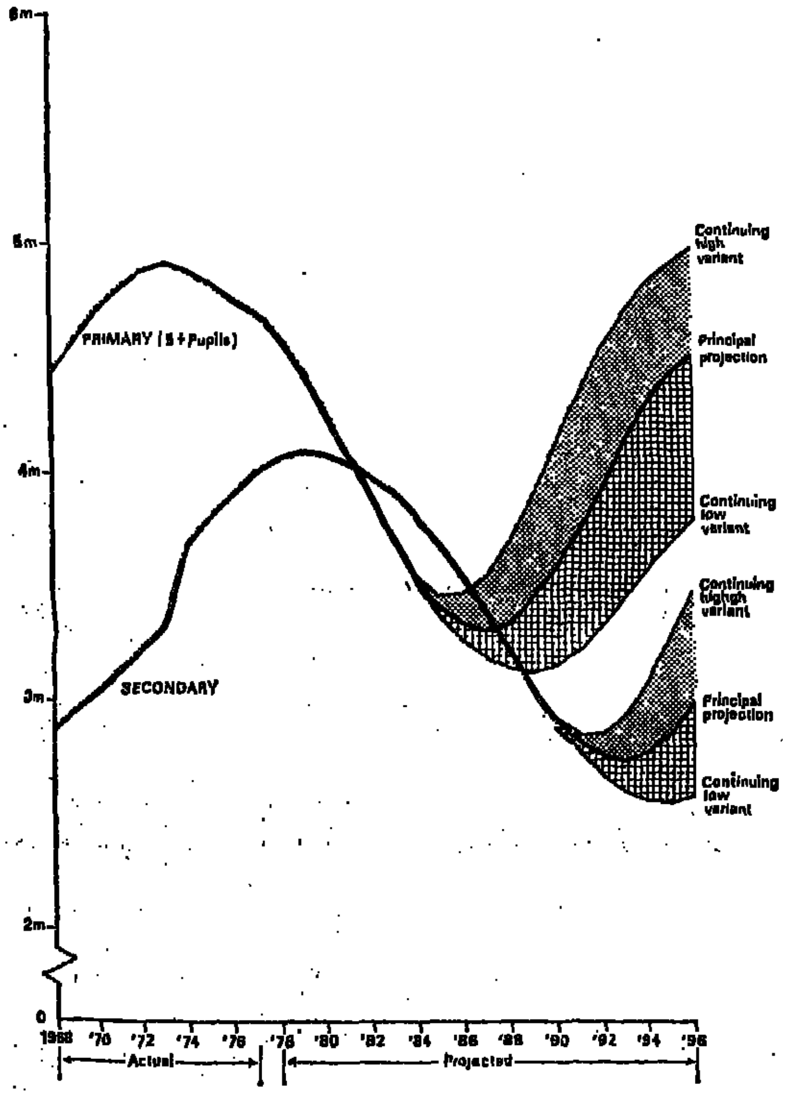
Pay rises of more than 40 per cent will be needed by next April if teachers are to re-establish their salaries at the levels agreed four years ago, Mr Bernard Wakefield, assistant general secretary of the National Association of Schoolmasters-Union of Women Teachers, said last week.

Mr Wakefield told a meeting of the union's Leicestershire association that the recently published index of national average earnings for March showed that teachers' salaries had declined in relation to other workers even more than his union had realized.

The Burnham Committee, which negotiates teachers' pay, has set up a working party to study how the scales of salaries introduced by the Houghton report of 1974 had kept pace with the cost of living and pay rises in other walks of life.

Mr Wakefield said that average national earnings had risen by 85.2 per cent between May 1974 and March 1978 which had kept wages slightly ahead of retail prices.

Teachers' salaries had fallen short to such a degree that a senior teacher would need a 30.13 per cent rise to keep in line with other employees as Houghton had intended. By next April, when a new salary claim would be submitted, a rise of at least 40 per cent would be needed.



DES projection of primary and secondary school population.

Rolls: huge variation in forecasts

by Bob Doe

Uncertainty about the birth rate means there could be half a million more or less children than expected in primary schools by the end of the next decade, according to the latest estimates of school population from the Department of Education and Science published this week.

The extent of the fall in the primary school population, from the present 4.6 millions to 3.4 millions in 1986, can be predicted with little error because most of the children involved have been born. Similarly, the expected secondary school numbers up to 1991, when there will only be 2.8 millions compared to the present 4.1 millions, are fairly certain.

But as no one knows what will happen to the birth rate over the next few years, the total number of school children could rise from 7 millions, predicted in the late 1980s, to 9 millions by 1995. On the other hand, there could be as few as 6.5 millions in schools in 1991.

As before, the DES estimates give the likely school population based on an increase or decrease in the birth rate. But in the latest predictions it introduces a new "principal" or "most likely" projection.

But it points out this could be 500,000 primary pupils out by the end of the next 10 years and 1 million primary and secondary pupils out by the mid-1990s.

Tory council rebels

A Conservative council has turned down an ultimatum from Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, to submit comprehensive education plans and intends to challenge her if she goes to law.

Kirklees' education committee decided this week not to meet the deadline of July 12 set by Mrs Williams for the submission of plans for the Batley, Heckmondwike and Liversedge areas. The rest of Kirklees has gone comprehensive.

After taking counsel's advice the committee decided it was prepared to challenge in the courts if she decides to take the matter to law. Court action is pending with three other education authorities.

Anti-Nazi offensive

The National Union of Students this week launched a new offensive against racism and fascism. It called for next Wednesday to be treated as Anti-Nazi Day.

A guide to the campaign sent out to all unions, suggests that students should compile dossiers on attacks on overseas students so that key areas where racist and fascist "thugs" operate can be identified.

Milk a social service

are also Conservative controlled.

Rural Tory authorities such as West Sussex, whose Education Committee voted to reject the money on Tuesday, see the provision of school milk as a social service rather than something that should be on the education budget. "Parents should not opt out of their responsibilities", said Mr Kenneth Ball, West Sussex chairman. "It is the job of parents to provide kids with milk."

He also pointed out that there was no evidence of substantial malnutrition in the county for the seven to 11 age group and children could get free milk anyway on medical grounds. This was one of the selling points in the Dairy Council's £50,000 advertising campaign.

Under the heading "Will the rest of Europe's children get a better deal than our own?", the council, which is funded by the dairy industry, posed another question: "Did you know some frightening facts about your children's nutrition?" It referred to research carried out by the University of London and Kelloggs.

"Some children 'fast' for 18 hours between tea at home at about 6.30 pm and lunch at school the next day", said the advertisement. It urged parents to make sure the decision taken by local authorities on the issue was the best one for their children, and it said it would only cost l.e.a.s 1p.

Other counties who have rejected the subsidy are Hertfordshire, Dorset, Cambridgeshire, and Kent. In Wiltshire the educational services sub-committee has rejected it but this will be considered by the Education Committee today. Although Hertfordshire has rejected it, this decision will be reconsidered on April 1 next year.

Until then the milk is being offered free to local authorities through a direct grant from the Department of Education and Science. Authorities like Hertfordshire decided not to take up the offer, even for this short period, because it would create difficulties if they decided to axe it.

Devon has decided to run the junior pupil subsidy and to review the decision next year. L.e.a.s have been given until September to tell the department whether they want the money or not, and few metropolitan authorities have yet made a decision. Those that have are in favour. About 40 of the 57 urban councils are expected to say yes.

In a single 324 page volume, Mathematics for Today covers all current modern O level syllabuses.
It's designed to teach modern topics over the whole ability range.
To overcome the difficulties modern mathematics has for many pupils, the authors have drawn on their considerable classroom experience:

- they've employed a largely traditional teaching approach, stressing examples and worked problems.
- the book is packed with work to assess progress and prepare for exams. There are practice problems to back up exposition, end-of-chapter revision tests and 40 minute test papers.
- the course structure can be suited to the needs of the individual class as each chapter treats a single topic and doesn't depend on the rest of the work.

Mathematics for Today gets down to the work of teaching modern mathematics.

School to work

Tory group wants more power and money for youth

A big extension of local education authority power over youth policy is recommended in the report of a Conservative Party study group. It proposes that l.e.a.s take responsibility for coordinating all provision for young people, including training.

The report, with a joint foreword by Mr Norman St John Stevas and Mr James Prior, the shadow education and employment secretaries, sets out an overall policy for youth which appears a good deal more radical than anything yet produced by the other parties. Among its proposals are:

- Offer of full-time training or education to everyone up to the age of 18.
- Transfer of responsibility for young people's training from the Department of Employment to a Department of Education and Training, which would replace the DES and take over the big training funds now channelled through the Manpower Services Commission.
- Local education committees to be replaced by local authority education and training committees with three sub-committees—education, youth, and careers advice and training.
- Lower the age for membership of school governing bodies and the proposed local authority sub-committees to 16, and require the sub-committees each to coopt two young people under 18.
- Create a unified careers service with a careers officer attached to every school.

The study group says: "While not seeking to extend the compulsory school-leaving age, our aim would be to change expectation of the commencement of working life from 16 to 18."

It makes it clear that, while the need for more training is itself urgent, the main purpose of its proposal is to offset unemployment by removing up to 1,300,000 youngsters from the labour market. Economic expansion is unlikely to generate enough new jobs, it believes. Only a scheme on the scale proposed, it claims, could cause a real reduction in the dole queues.

The report suggests that the scheme should not be rigidly controlled from the centre, but that colleges, companies, training associations, voluntary organizations and others might all offer two-year training programmes which could be monitored by the Manpower Services Commission.

The group says that it might become necessary to keep young people out of the labour market until they are 20, but that on the whole training up to the age of 18 should be enough in the years ahead.

The report also calls for more help for students, both through better grants and improved financial support for student unions: it draws attention in particular to the poor state of student organization in the smaller further education colleges, and urges local authorities to make sure that proper facilities are provided.

On grants, the group wants:

Mandatory awards for all taking their first course in further, and higher education—to include those taking studies at below degree level. It would mean that a student would get a grant to do A levels at a further education college and another grant for his university studies.

Improved discretionary awards, governed by stringent national guidelines, for others in non-advanced further education.

The dropping of the parental contribution, in the long term, to grants for students over 18.

For the youth service, the group advocated:

A minister of state for youth within the proposed Department of Education and Training, advised by a strengthened Youth Service Forum.

A set percentage of local authority budgets to be allocated statutorily to youth service expenditure; with national guidelines for youth facilities to which authorities would have to conform.

Local authority support for youth councils, which should have links with school councils.

The youth service to cover youngsters from the age of 10 to 25, with priority attention to the 14 to 19-year-olds.

The report also proposes that a core curriculum for political education should be developed with the help of the Hansard Society, and that it should be included, together with social education, in curricular guidelines to be issued to all schools.

A Time for Youth, Conservative Central Office, 50p.

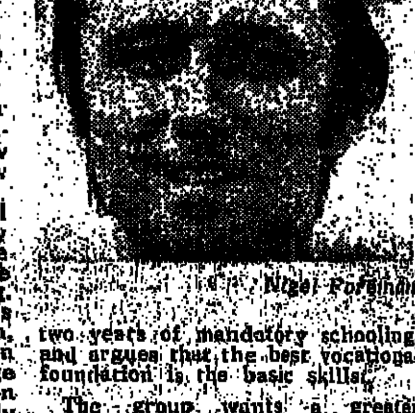
Foreman team against DES expansion

The recommendations of two other Tory policy groups studying education in relation to industry are now also being considered by the Shadow Cabinet.

One group, headed by Mr Nigel Foreman, MP, comes out firmly against the idea of enlarging the DES to a department responsible for both education and training. The group began its investigations with some sympathy for the idea, believing it would help break down what it saw as resistance to change in the present department, but in the end decided it was more likely that those attitudes would simply be extended to training.

The Foreman group, whose report will remain confidential, agrees both with the Youth policy group and with the third study group, set up by Dr Keith Hampson, MP, that something needs urgently to be done to improve careers guidance. The Foreman report calls for the DES to lay down guidelines under which all authorities would be asked to adopt the standards already developed in many places.

It is against any move to introduce specific vocational specialization for pupils earlier than the last two years of mandatory schooling and argues that the best vocational foundation is the basic skills.



Nigel Forman

The group wants a greater emphasis to be placed on technician education in Further Education, particularly for girls, and supports the idea of encouraging partime studies, preferably through day release.

The Hampson working party, which was chaired by Professor John Thornton, professor of engineering at Newcastle University, and included a large group of engineering dons, recommends new steps to enable technicians to qualify as graduate engineers.

Reports by Mark Jackson

Union doubts on apprentice upheaval

Unions outside the engineering industry are beginning to voice their reservations about the Engineering Industry Training Board's proposals to revolutionize its apprenticeship system and ask schools to incorporate some of the training into their curriculum.

At last week's TUC education committee meeting the National Union of Teachers' general secretary, Mr Fred Jarvis, got considerable support for his view that any attempts to bring off-the-job training into the schools should be carefully tailored to meet the needs of all future apprentices and young workers, rather than the requirements of just one industry.

It was agreed that this and a number of other issues needed to be worked out in detail before the TUC's general council was asked to give its blessing to any proposals.

Pioneer study scheme

Student teachers are to study local industry at first hand in a pioneering Gloucestershire scheme. Nearly 40 students in the second year of their degree course will visit one of 21 local concerns—ranging from a hospital to a brewery—when the scheme starts next year.

The idea is to break the normal career cycle of the teacher in training—from school to college and back into school—said Mr John O'Brien, senior lecturer in education at St Mary's College, Cheltenham, one of three colleges of education in the link plan.

Leavers swell dole queues, but overall figure is down

School leaver unemployment leapt to nearly 140,000 in Great Britain this month, more than treble the May figure, as the first large batch of summer leavers joined the register.

But in spite of this increase the number of jobless leavers, 139,254, is about 2 per cent down on last June's total. This is in spite of the fact that the new Youth Opportunities Programme is not yet biting significantly into leaver unemployment, and that the job creation programme projects, which were last year available to 16-year-olds, are closing down.

The number of vacancies notified to careers offices, 30,600, is down by more than 2,000 since last month but is still 3,500 more than last June.

Employment specialists believe that this year's pattern of leaver unemployment is affected by [illegible] new considerations—the increased size of the age group, the prospect of getting into the youth opportunities programme, the gradual development of new sixth-form courses for the non-academic pupils—and it is therefore not possible to read any reliable conclusions as to the overall position.

'£12 a week' for stay-on pupils

A £12-a-week grant for all 16-19-year-olds who stay in education, whether at school or at college is being urged by the National Union of Students. Pupils who left school at 16 for a year should also be entitled to go back to a full-time college course on a similar grant, says the union.

The grants should be paid direct to the students by the local authority who would be able to reclaim 90 per cent of the cost from the Government.

The proposal is outlined in a 10-page document responding to the plan put forward by Education Secretary, Mrs Shirley Williams, for a system of means-tested grants.

Welcoming Mrs Williams's proposals the NUS said it believed all students who stay in full-time education beyond compulsory school leaving age should be entitled to a grant of at least the £12 a week payable in social security to unemployed people of the same age.

Schools 'should meet engineers' needs'

Schools should be made to show that pupils have the kind of ability engineers require, teachers of technology told the Government Inquiry into the engineering profession this week.

The inquiry, under Sir Monty Finniston, heard from the School Technology Forum, an association of teachers interested in teaching engineering and technology in schools, that industry's selection procedures were to blame for the shortage of able young people interested in engineering.

Industry only asked for evidence of ability in maths and science at school, never for evidence of a capability to act as a creative problem solving managerial engineer.

PERSONAL COLUMN

John Rae

Reverend Sir

Ben Jonson, who was a boy at Westminster under William Camden, recorded his gratitude to his former headmaster in verse:

> Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
> All that I am in arts, all that I know . . .

In the myths we build round the memory of our childhood "the teacher to whom I owe everything" has an important role. To him we attribute the decisive leaps in our intellectual development; his eccentricities acquire the power of legends; even when we leave him far behind, his shadow falls across our path. How formidable they are in retrospect, these great teachers of the past. It is inconceivable that they had problems of discipline or engaged in anything as sordid as salary negotiations. They were a law unto themselves, remote from fashionable trends and disdainful of the trappings of authority that sustained their less individual colleagues.

In my own schooldays I had the good fortune to encounter at least two such figures: Walter Strachan, who corresponded with Aragon and took tea with Henry Moore, and to whose Higher Certificate French periods I can trace the origin of my awakening to literature and art; and Charles Mellows, a more complex phenomenon, who communicates a lively enthusiasm for Latin and English authors by implying that the writers and their characters were acquaintances with whom he was on more or less familiar terms. When Charles Mellows spoke of Macbeth there was always a note of personal sadness, as though they had served together in Duncan's army but had subsequently drifted apart. I cannot recall his ever having to punish a boy for misbehaviour, though he did keep a large wooden sword with which to strike a token blow at the inattentive; and he used a dirty book cupboard as a dungeon for persistent offenders. Heaven knows what the National Council for Civil Liberties would have made of it all. No doubt we were denied all sorts of fundamental children's rights, but one we did enjoy, the right to be well taught.

The assumption implicit in these memories and myths is that men such as these were born teachers, possessed of some natural gift of inspiring enthusiasm and commanding respect; that they needed neither the benefits of training nor the fruits of experiment; and that we, their heirs, are a right soft lot, inhibited by educational and psychological theory and confused by the findings of research.

The assumption is based, however, on a false dichotomy between teaching as an art in which success is dependent on certain innate qualities developed by experience, and teaching as a science which requires its practitioners to be trained and kept abreast of the latest research and techniques. Those outside education not infrequently believe that the ability to teach is comparable to the gift of tongues: you may be born with it, you may possibly have it thrust upon you by some supernatural agency, but you can never acquire it however hard you try. While at the other extreme, there are men and women in education who think that a thorough training and a familiarity with the most recent research provide a sure foundation for success in the classroom.

Most of us like to think we combine an openness to new ideas and an ability to develop professional expertise with the qualities of a born teacher. But do we even know what the qualities of a born teacher are? Let me return to Messrs Strachan and Mellows. Why did I think then and why do I still believe that they were born teachers? Well, for one thing they seemed to love their job. That may be a trite comment but it is all important.

It is not true that all teachers love their job. They may be dependent on it as on a drug so that to leave it would be to risk withdrawal symptoms of a shattering kind. But dependence is not love. They may see their job as a way of changing society but exploitation is not love either. They may regard their job as second best to the career they always wanted to follow so that they will for ever be bitching about status; they no more love teaching than a man who thinks he has married beneath him loves his wife.

But with Messrs Strachan and Mellows it wasn't like that. They appeared to regard themselves as exceptionally fortunate to be allowed to spend their lives teaching the subject they loved. There was a humility and a wonder in their approach that assured you they never thought any other job could compare with this one. If they were ambitious it was to impart some of the joys and insights they had themselves acquired. Their enthusiasm for their subjects was infectious. Just as Christianity is caught not taught so of course is an enthusiasm for learning a particular subject. It is depressing to find how often a boy or girl has been put off a subject by dull teaching at an early stage.

So love of and enthusiasm for the subject is one sign of a born teacher. Another which is more difficult to define, enables the teacher to be more interested in the pupils than in himself. For some teachers [illegible] their whole life at school [illegible] long performance. They need the pupils as an actor needs his audience but they take no interest in them as individuals. [illegible] will applaud, even encourage [illegible] performance, so that he thinks he is doing rather well particularly when compared with the more self-effacing teacher who does not appear to command the same popular support. But he fools himself. The pupils know the difference between a performer and someone who really cares. Indeed they know, instinctively, perhaps, when they are faced with a born teacher. Ben Jonson understood.

> What name, what skill, what faith thou hast in things!
> What sight in searching the most antique springs!
> What weight, and what authority in thy speech!
> Man scarce can make that doubt, but thou canst teach.

Oxford entry eased for selected London pupils

Five Oxford University colleges are relaxing their entry requirements to help bright comprehensive school children from inner London.

Selected science students will be offered a place if they can get at least one grade B and two grade Cs at A level. The usual Oxford minimum is one grade A and two grade Bs.

The scheme was devised by ILEA science teachers and Oxford dons who agreed that many children bright enough to make the grade at Oxford stood little chance of winning places because they did not have the same advantages as grammar or independent school children.

Dr John Spice, ILEA staff inspector for science, said that candidates had been sought from schools where the sixth form came from a non-selective intake rather than a previous grammar school intake.

"While a conditional offer in terms of ABB A level grades may be fair and realistic for grammar school pupils, it may have the effect of discouraging even those pupils in comprehensive schools who undoubtedly have the ability to obtain such grades," he said.

"The intention is not to provide an easy entry to Oxford for those who are not really of the required standard, but to give those who are of this standard a fairer chance of entry than they have, or what is perhaps more important, than they feel they have, at present."

Such children could suffer academically because of the high turnover of mathematics and science teachers in London or because their schools had small sixth forms with little stimulus.

Twenty-seven have already been selected as possible candidates and have been on a day visit to Oxford. They will go to ILEA summer schools for extra coaching before they are finally selected to go to interviews at the colleges.

The colleges involved are St Catherine's, Lady Margaret Hall, Magdalen, St Hilda's and University College. Dr Michael Leask, senior tutor at St Catherine's, said: "We see it as a pump priming exercise, so that London children will see they can aim for Oxford."

Firms set for court battle over 'perk' scholarships

The Inland Revenue's announcement last week that it is going to tax the scholarships awarded by companies to children of directors and higher paid employees has sent the firms scurrying to their lawyers for advice.

The Revenue is clamping down on the "perks" enjoyed by directors and executives and the move is almost certain to be opposed in the courts.

Unilever, which has just set up a scheme due to start this September, is going ahead for the first 12 months while it gets more detailed information. "We are going to operate the scheme provisionally for a year until the tax situation is clarified," a company spokesman said this week.

Various firms run scholarship schemes for employees' children. Barclays Bank has been in the business for the longest. Its awards, which cover 90 per cent of the costs of private education, started in 1928. This year 60 children, out of 420 who applied, were awarded undisclosed sums of money.

Barclays' employees have to put their children through a written and oral examination. But other schemes which cater for university students do not have tests. Instead, a group of trustees, usually including some academics or educationists, decides on an application.

The amount given to university students is related to the size of a local authority grant, but the companies are reluctant to release details of the size of the awards.

British Petroleum, for example, would only reveal that 1,100 students are being funded and they have to be the son or daughter of an

by Stephen Cohen

employee permanently-based in the United Kingdom.

ICI's scheme gives an average £300 to each of the 2,500 university students currently involved. A spokesman for the company's trust said only about 25 per cent of students received the full parental contribution towards their grants and there was considerable hardship for quite a lot of people.

"We don't top up the grant to the full amount. It is unwise to featherbed students too completely", the spokesman said. "The basic scholarship is about 70 per cent of the maintenance requirement. There is also a merit award based on the number of A levels, at A grade, the student has got.

"The aims are to increase the financial independence of the student and to give some reward for achieved academic merit. We do give a minimum award to people who are getting near the maximum local education authority grant."

Both BP and ICI said they would be looking at the Inland Revenue's announcement in detail. "We're taking advice again", said BP. "The trustees, who are meeting in July, will look at the fine print", said ICI.

Both companies stressed that the scholarships were open to children of all employees. "From doorman to director", was a phrase used by BP. But the tax clamp-down is aimed at directors and higher-paid executives who are defined as those earning more than £7,500 a year. They are singled out in the Finance Act, 1976, a section of which contains provisions for taxation of benefits in kind. Lower-paid employees will not suffer since the tax rules are different.

Most of the company schemes have been running for two years. They were set up quietly after the 1976 Act by sharp-eyed consultants who noticed an apparent inconsistency in the tax laws. A section of the 1970 Taxes Act exempted scholarships from the Inland Revenue's grasp. But now Revenue has had another look at the law and decided that the 1970 section does not override the 1976 Act.

The effect of the change will mean that the value of the scholarship will be added to the parent's income and then taxed. An executive paying tax at the 50 per cent rate would have to pay back £150 if the scholarship was worth £300.

Foreign Office and military personnel who receive allowances for school fees if they work abroad will not be affected since the fees are considered to be part of the foreign service allowance which is exempt from tax.

Company personnel who are sent abroad for more than one year will also be unaffected. The tax rules allow them to claim 100 per cent deduction.

The new schemes being proposed by some local authorities which do not run schools to pay for independent school places will not be covered either, since the Revenue move hinges on the relationship between an employer and employee. If, by chance, the daughter of a borough engineer is financed through a private school by a local authority, this will be regarded as a "fortuitous connection".

Tory call for crash programme to help 'unemployable'

A crash programme to help 100,000 youngsters, who were so bad at writing and handling figures they were nearly unemployable, was called for last weekend by Dr Keith Hampson, MP, vice-chairman of the Conservative parliamentary education committee.

It should be the first objective of the next Tory government, he told a Conservative advisory committee on education conference. Dr Hampson condemned the Government for offering bribes to children to stay at school when what they really wanted was opportunities to work.

Plan to educate about EEC

More than £3m may be spent on teaching children about the Common Market if European education ministers approve proposals put up by the EEC Commission in Brussels.

Under the scheme all children under 18 would be taught the aims and history of the Community. They would be told how it works and how it affects their lives and the rest of the world.

The proposals have been put forward by the EEC Commissioner for Educational Policy, Mr Guido Brunner, in response to the agreement among education ministers in 1976 that there should be a "European dimension" in Community schools.

Mr Brunner says there should be systematic encouragement of the study of the Community in all schools, a Community-wide curriculum development project, and in-service and initial training to prepare more teachers to teach about the EEC.

The aim is to ensure that all pupils in every member country should learn about the community through a coherent sequence of study spread throughout their primary and secondary schooling. The proposals recognize that teaching may have to be adapted to suit different countries and schools.

The programme would start in 1980 if it is approved by the education ministers at their autumn meeting.

Parliament

Free bus travel may be cut

A Department of Education rethink on school bus fares could mean that some children now travelling free will have to pay. A scheme now being worked out is expected to include proposals for a new flat-rate fare regardless of distance travelled.

But free travel for children in country areas is unlikely to be scrapped and flat-rate fares could mean some children will be paying less than they are now.

The Education Under Secretary, Miss Margaret Jackson, told the Commons this week that the Department hoped to publish its proposals on "easing the present anomalies on fares" before Parliament breaks for the summer recess.

"It is our hope that the proposals will contain the basis of a scheme which will enable all children to travel to school for a reasonable sum", she said. The present system of free travel costs £100m a year.

Questions

School records: There were no statutory requirements concerning school records, Miss Jackson said in another reply. Decisions about access by parents were the responsibility of l.e.a.s and practice varies.

However, as part of the wider review of their curricular activities occasioned by the Green Paper "Education in Schools" the department had asked authorities to examine and report on their existing record-keeping practices.

School uniforms: Miss Jackson said the review of the present arrangements concerning school uniform grants, which was informal, was taking account of material already available and of discussions with officials of the Supplementary Benefits Commission. It was not proposed to invite further evidence from outside bodies.

O level maths and English a must for future teachers

From autumn 1980 all entrants to graduate teacher training must have O level English and mathematics, the Government announced this week.

This will be in addition to two passes at A level, Mrs Shirley Williams, Education Secretary, told the Commons. CSE grade 1 in English and mathematics would also be acceptable. Any candidate without either qualification in the two subjects should "otherwise satisfy the institution concerned and its validating body of numeracy and literacy to the equivalent level", she said.

Mrs Williams again condemns voucher experiment

The voucher scheme, with which the Kent education authority are to experiment in its Ashford division, was roundly condemned by Mrs Shirley Williams, Secretary of State for Education, in the Commons this week. She called it "an irresponsible proposal" and "a waste of money".

Mrs Williams said the proposals were a recipe for overcrowding in some schools and a waste of expenditure on temporary accommodation while others were under-used.

In a written reply, following the Commons exchanges, she said a voucher system, as the Kent feasibility study made clear, was cumbrous and expensive. There were more efficient and fairer ways of taking account of parental wishes.

Replying to Mr John Ovenden (Gravesend, Lab), Mrs Williams said she had not been asked by l.e.a.s for permission to introduce experimental education voucher schemes. Nor had she had any consultations on this.

Mr Ovenden said the Kent decision was a "ludicrous waste of educational resources". It was a strange sense of priorities for an authority which had one of the worst pupil-teacher ratios in the country, an abysmal record on nursery education and which could not afford to reintroduce free school milk in junior schools.

When the Liberal spokesman on education, Mr Alan Beith (Berwick upon Tweed) inquired if Mrs Williams had had any indication from the official Opposition that they wished to introduce such a scheme, the Secretary of State said there had been enjoyable cacophony from the Conservative Front Bench.

She said Mr Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North, C) had indicated it was a first-rate proposal for turning the clock back in education. Mr Norman St John-Stevas (Chelmsford, C), who had a more balanced approach, had indicated in a recent Panorama programme on television that he was far from enthusiastic about the voucher.

Mr Bryan Davies (Enfield North, Lab) chided Mrs Williams for being so gentle with the Opposition. This, he said, was yet another political gimmick from the Friedman centre of education to try to introduce a cash nexus into education.

Mrs Williams said what amazed her about the scheme was that a study undertaken by Kent indicated this was an inefficient way of meeting parental choice. On the evidence, this was an absurd aberration and an absurd experiment. It was a totally irresponsible proposal, she said, and no sensible authority would think of introducing it.

Action on school management as soon as possible

Legislation on some aspects of school management and government would be introduced as soon as the parliamentary timetable permitted, Miss Margaret Jackson, Under Secretary for Education and Science, told the Commons this week.

Mr David Knox (Leek, C) considered the matter urgent in view of concern about the appointments to school governing and management bodies among many people. It was important to ensure, he said, that people who got on to bodies had an interest in education and the school rather than being merely political appointees.

Miss Jackson agreed and said it was a source of much dismay that a number of Conservative authorities were throwing everybody off governing bodies except those who said they support Tory party policy. Action on the Taylor report could be taken without the need for legislation. It was within the power of authorities to introduce changes now.

Mr Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield, C) referred to the role of parents and the need for local councils to be able to continue their role. Miss Jackson hoped l.e.a.s would take every step to enable parents to participate more in the management.

Reports by Alan Wood

Curriculum 11 to 16 is a collection of papers produced by HMIs arguing the case for a common core amounting to between two thirds and three quarters of the curriculum for all children up to the age of 16. "The freedom to stop studying history, art, music or biology at 14 means that pupils are not being given the introduction to their own cultural inheritance to which we believe they have a right", they say.

They imply that many pupils are allowed to choose programmes in which "major elements of knowledge and experience necessary to their future well-being are lacking or under-represented".

They give a checklist of eight "areas of experience" that all children should have in their curriculum. These are the aesthetic and creative, the ethical, the linguistic, the mathematical, the physical, the scientific, the social and political and the spiritual.

They look, too, at the attitudes and skills all children need to prepare them for life and work, and the part each subject can play in the common core. There is no mention of modern languages.

Vague, inconsistent, platitudinous . . . little help

Six heads talk to Bob Doe about 'Curriculum 11-16'

With one exception, six headteachers asked by the TES to read and comment on Curriculum 11 to 16 found it unhelpful. They found little actually to disagree with in its 80 pages, but also little real guidance on just what should be in the secondary curriculum.

Few recognized the "unacceptable variety" or "patchwork curriculum" complained of by the inspectors. Where, the heads wanted to know, were those schools which allowed pupils to drop crucial subjects such as English and maths in the fourth and fifth year.

All six heads were themselves trying to ensure balance in the curriculum up to the age of 16 through what amounted to a core with options scheme. All more or less insisted on every fourth and fifth former doing English, maths, a science and one of the humanities (although the definition of the last two differed from school to school).

Mr Patrick Eavis, headmaster of Manor Park School, Newcastle upon Tyne, thought the report an attempt to justify the traditional academic curriculum with contemporary jargon. "These people have obviously read Hirst and Peters and all that. I was brought up on it myself, but all it does is look at what is in the curriculum and find good reasons for it being there.

The headteachers

- Mr Peter Cornall, Carisbrooke High School, Isle of Wight; a 13 to 18 mixed comprehensive for 1,300 pupils.
- Mr Patrick Eavis, Manor Park School, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; an 11 to 18 mixed comprehensive of 1,000 pupils.
- Mr Geoffrey Foster, the Towers School; an 11 to 16 mixed High School in Ashford, Kent, with 900 pupils.
- Mr Geoffrey Goodall, Lord Williams's School, Thame; an 11 to 18 mixed comprehensive for 1,900 pupils.
- Mrs Valerie Jenkins, Haverstock School, London; an 11 to 18 mixed comprehensive for 1,300 pupils.
- Mr John Sharples, The Deanery Church of England High School, Wigan; a mixed upper school for 1,100 13 to 18-year-olds.

"They wrap it all up in words like objectives and skills but it tells you nothing about what precisely we should be doing, or how. It is just a nice safe justification for the traditional view of what is taught.

"The truth is, most kids are bored out of their minds with this stuff. It's OK for those who know they only have to put up with it for a few years to get a nice job like mine, but what are the other 80 per cent here for?"

"Nothing in this report is going to cause a revolution in terms of motivation; getting kids interested in what they are doing and actually wanting to do it." The report was backward rather than forward looking. "What I am concerned about is just what sort of science should we do and how can we make it relevant to the twentieth century, let alone the twenty-first.

"Teaching them about pop groups and football is no answer either. Of course we have got to expand their horizons and offer them genuine choices in life, but how do you do it? This report is no help in this respect at all."

Mr Geoffrey Goodall, principal of Lord Williams's School, Thame, thought a lot of what the HMI said was "wholly excellent", but complained of too many highflown statements not matching up to reality.

HMIs expected schools to fulfil the role of God, he said. Enabling children to "find their way in a complicated society and to face with some security the world they encounter" was a tall order for schools. "The present curse is the over-expectation from schools of a society that has failed and is looking for a scapegoat or messiah."

Mr Peter Cornall, from Carisbrooke High School on the Isle of Wight, thought many important points were made in the report, but he too found it wanting when it came to giving the down-to-earth guidance needed by schools. He thought it revealed the ambivalence of HMIs about the comprehensive system.

"If HMIs are to be any real help to schools they must get rid of their hang-ups, both about comprehensive education as a national policy and as a system which poses very special problems in terms of value judgments within schools. "The recent HMI surveys on the gifted and on modern languages and one's own contact with inspectors reveal the dilemma of those HMI who find it hard to see how their particular area of concern can be properly served within a fully comprehensive system."

The 64,000 dollar question posed by the inspectors was how schools should balance social objectives with the pursuit of academic achievement. "This sort of ambivalance is no help to those of us who have to reconcile those problems", Mr Cornall said.

"References abound to 'general ethos', 'personal relationships', institutional styles and structures. All this implies that some features are more helpful than others. So which are they?

"Do streaming, canes, uniforms or prefects help or do they not?" What "spectrum of attitudes" was most likely to produce the desirable balance of academic and social objectives—or were they to be declared relative and dependent on local circumstances? "If so our guides have the most absolute of escape clauses and all the talk of the circumstances of real schools shrinks to a platitude."

Mrs Valerie Jenkins, of Haverstock School, London, also thought the report platitudinous. She agreed wholeheartedly with it that the emphasis of the curriculum needed to be shifted away from learning facts towards concepts and skills.

But this conflicted with the "teach me" attitude of specialist HMI's who had written other sections devoted to individual subjects.

"I accept these aims but what can we do against the stranglehold of the universities and exam boards over the curriculum of the upper school? Even with a mode three it is not easy to get a more broadly based syllabus through the exam board.

"I would have liked to have seen more criticism in the report of the exam boards which still insist on large amounts of factual recall. Teachers just can't find time to do the skills-based work suggested."

Mr Geoffrey Foster of the Towers School, Ashford, Kent, said the report contained many vague generalizations and failed to take account of the wide variation of abilities in schools.

The inspectors never really said what they meant by a common or protected core, or what subject matter it should contain. Saying everyone should do maths was one thing, but there was no guidance from HMI on what that should include. As in the Great Debate, the question of resources had been ignored. "All problems are capable of being solved provided we have the resources", he said.

The head most favourably disposed towards the HMIs' views was Mr John Sharples from Deanery High School, Wigan. He thought the report "most excellent and significant". It distilled some of the things many teachers had come to believe about the 11 to 16 curriculum.

Case study: This steamroller, conceived and built from scratch by Christopher Paterson of Lord Williams's School, Thame, was cited by his headmaster, Geoffrey Goodall, as the sort of confidence boosting work that can be achieved in years four and five if there is no rigid insistence on a common core. For this former remedial boy, the result was not just a beautiful piece of machinery. Positive advances could be traced through the written and figure work associated with this CSE project and Geoffrey Goodall claims he has suffered little through not being forced to take a science subject to the age of 16.

"We have gone too far in one direction", he said. "We have allowed our concern about establishing opportunities for young people to choose over a wide range to militate against a balanced curriculum. "It is more than a matter of what subjects are on the timetable. Subjects should be vehicles for general education. In the end it boils down to the quality of teachers and teaching.

"The report brings home the point that subjects alone are no indication of balance. In the right hands even a subject like typing can be a wonderful vehicle for educating children in the fullest sense."

It could make inroads into the seven curriculum "areas of experience" the HMIs listed (aesthetic, ethical, linguistic, mathematical, physical, scientific, social and spiritual). Ethics came into discussions about how to behave in the office. Language came through the English used and aesthetics through considerations of layout and neatness of work.

On this point Mr Sharples was in accord with Mr Goodall, who did not agree with the HMI proposals that two-thirds to three quarters of the curriculum should be common up to the age of 16. This illustrated, perhaps, how small was any distance between the thinking of the six heads.

Geoffrey Goodall was least happy of the six about insisting on balance in the curriculum, regardless of the wishes of pupils. "Society has moved away from the HMIs' Renaissance view of balance."

The period between five and 14 was long enough for a rigid common core to apply, he thought. By the time some pupils reached that age they were beginning to dig their heels in about subjects they had rejected.

Compelling them to continue was wasteful of scarce resources, disruptive of good teaching and the inevitably modest achievement at the end did nothing for the child concerned. It was important to give children the success that would give them confidence.

"Does it really matter if they choose a lop-sided programme in spite of all our advice?" Society rewarded those who specialized early.

It was no good setting out to turn out independent thinkers if they were not to be allowed to choose what to study after three years' experience of these subjects. They had to face a laisser-faire economy when they left school and it was right that their final years should be similarly organized.

"I've a hunch that what really matters is the teachers they have, rather than the subjects. Some inspire, open windows, light fires, encourage tight modes of thinking, motivate and lead to self-discipline while others merely aggravate."

About one third of all jobs could be trained for in a month and few professions were closed to pupils because of what they studied in the fourth year.

The HMIs said allowing pupils to give up certain subjects at the age of 14 was denying them part of their heritage. Mr Goodall thought their heritage was just too big to cram into the secondary curriculum.

Patrick Eavis, too, felt there was little knowledge, as opposed to basic skills, that every child had to have. He described as "crass" the history HMIs' attempts to justify their subject in terms of the seven "areas of experience".

What was important was using subjects like this as vehicles through which children could learn how to find out things, learn how to use a public library, catch glimpses of their heritage and gain some of the essential self-confidence needed to face the outside world.

Valerie Jenkins looked towards more integration of subjects to cover the whole range of experience. She resented the resoluteness with which HMIs seemed to have turned their faces away from this approach.

The HMI report is silent on modern languages, the subject causing some heads most difficulty so far as a common core is concerned. In every one of these six schools it is not included in the common core after the third year. "We let them drop it simply because a great number wish to do so", Peter Cornall said.

Mr Sharples thought schools should be more "European-minded" but not enough progress had been made in developing ways to teach languages to the less able.

Valerie Jenkins said: "Modern languages cause us a great deal of heartsearching." Not only were they dropped by a large number of pupils after the third year, but the introduction of a second language for those who wanted it in that year eroded the rest of the common core because pupils had to drop craft or games in order to fit it in.

Mr Eavis said languages were one of the least successful parts of the secondary curriculum. "It's like the Battle of the Somme. Thousands of kids go into it at the start but by the end there is only a trickle of survivors."

Not all the heads accorded the same importance as the inspectors to the need to introduce some degree of standardization into the curriculum for the sake of those children who changed schools when their families moved. But there was fairly general acceptance that schools could not be left independently to devise their curriculum, though taking account of society's needs was easier said than done.

Mr Peter Cornall said schools and teachers had to accept less independence, but just who could validly speak for society? "If our autonomy must be modified, how are we to decide what new external influences are to be recognized as proper ones? Which parents, how selected and how well-informed, may represent their interests?".

Mr Cornall took issue with the notion that teachers had an obligation to society rather than to pupils as individuals. "It is my belief that all the duty we owe to people, both in our private and public roles, can be adequately expressed as obligations to people."

He wanted to see a distinction made between a school's duty to help pupils to face the demands of life and work and its right to refuse to mediate those demands through the curriculum it offered.

Geoffrey Goodall made a similar point when he questioned how far it was right for schools to reflect the demands of a far from perfect society? How could they educate a child for a society that was itself fragmented and divided, that applauded hard work, honesty and integrity and yet appeared to reward the opposite?

The report's emphasis on developing personal awareness conflicted with the idea of preparation for the world of work, which could be harsh, tedious and unpleasant.

He agreed that heads had to remain open to outside influences but they already had to take account of governors, l.e.a.s, the DES, the law, the local community, staff, pupils, parents, local industry, the unions and politicians.

"We cannot be all things to all men and in the end we have to take a stand about what we believe we are about."

Partnership meant yielding total autonomy but too much would lead to fragmentation and the destruction of the school's own integrity. Too much diversity, too much pluralism led to a blurring of focus and a lowering of standards.

"Schools have got to be prepared to have priorities and those inevitably will be personal ones. The dictatorial head is bad, but the chap who faces all ways at once and is nothing is just as bad."

Valerie Jenkins thought it was asking too much of schools to provide a complete social education. This neglected the role of continuing education and of day release where issues like buying a house, the world of work and the social security system could be dealt with at a time when they were more relevant.

Schools had to be prepared to listen to outsiders like parents and employers but in the end the school had to strike the balance, Mr Foster said.

He was glad to see that there was no suggestion of a centrally directed curriculum from the inspectors. "That would be a disaster. The secret garden is something no one can enter because it is the relationship between teacher and pupil. You can put what you like down on paper but it is the values taught by the teacher that matter."

John Sharples did see a central role for the DES in the establishment of the common core, though it was not laying down what ought to be in it.

"I would like to see more leadership and help from the DES both in terms of money and words. It is time those in authority paid more than lip-service to the need for in-service training.

"It means also educating the public about how to define an educated person at the age of 16 and what attitudes they should adopt towards exams.

"The DES should publicize these ideas in an understandable way, not just in this report. It has to be got across that there is nothing contradictory between what we are aiming to do and our attempts to raise standards of literacy and numeracy.

"The public have got to be shown that this is not just some hifalutin idea to disguise our inability to turn out young people who can read and write, and the more thoughtful politicians from both parties might see this as well."

'Elite' schools for Eurocrats under attack

by Stephen Cohen

Elite schools for the children of Common Market civil servants are attacked today by the Socialist Educational Association. The European schools, one of which is to be built in Britain, are designed to ensure that Common Market bureaucrats can give their children a high quality education separate from that normally provided in the countries where they are working, the association claims.

Mr John Hamilton, vice-chairman of the association, says in today's edition of Socialism and Education that in theory the European schools appear progressive because they are comprehensive and international.

"But they are limited in practice to children of Commission civil servants, thus catering almost exclusively to a privileged class of Eurocrats, and offering an education which is often rigid in curriculum."

The association is firmly against the "network of elite schools". The vast sums of money being spent on them are in marked contrast to those being spent on the education of migrant workers' children, Mr Hamilton says.

"These European schools are a twentieth century version of the nineteenth century public schools. They have no place in a socialist concept of education."

The association is also opposed to the establishment of European universities which are said to be a waste of money. Britain contributes about half a million pounds a year to the one at Florence and sends ten students.

Mr Hamilton criticizes the proposals for standardized examinations. "We want to see flexible assessments. We want to see students and schools and teachers free to devise their own syllabuses.

"We are also opposed to the increased use of rigid 'final examination' style assessment systems. We prefer continuous assessment."

The proposed standard record card for all pupils in Europe is bitterly attacked. "We in the British Labour Party are totally opposed to it. No cards should be used other than those which give name, address, age, and, perhaps, school attended.

"There should be no further information which could lead to a dossier on students—with subjective judgments of teachers, or comment on student activities or backgrounds, or pedagogical assessments which are liable to error or misinterpretation—so much of which could be prejudicial to individuals." Socialism and Education, Vol 5 No 4, 25p, 129 Ripon Road, Stevenage, Hertfordshire.

Probationer gets extension

Mr David Potter, the London probationary teacher who claimed he was being penalized for his trade union activities, has been granted six months to prove that he can reach an acceptable standard of "practical proficiency."

Mr Potter, aged 39, was told earlier this year that his local authority, the London Borough of Hillingdon, was recommending to the Department of Education that he should be considered unsuitable for employment as a teacher.

He was suspended from school last December after allegations that he used politically-biased literature in a course on government and politics with a fourth-year class. Although he was reinstated a month later, Hillingdon decided not to recommend him for employment.

During his time as a probationary teacher, Mr Potter was elected secretary of the Hillingdon branch of the National Union of Teachers, and claimed the equivalent of one day off a week for trade union duties.

The DES has now written to him saying his case has been considered. Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, "is not yet satisfied with your practical proficiency as a teacher and has decided to extend your probationary period for a further period of six months to end on November 30, 1978", the letter says.

Baby boom thought possible

There could be a big upswing in the birthrate soon following the plunge in the number of children born in recent years according to Government population experts.

A stocktaking review of Britain's population published this week by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys points to the rapidity of recent changes. It warns that planning for schools, employment, health services and housing should be kept flexible and emphasizes that future birthrate changes need to be more carefully monitored than ever.

After the steep fall in the numbers born each year—a drop of about one-third over the past decade—there are some signs that the rate may have stabilized. Births in the first half of this year were about 2 per cent up on the same period last year.

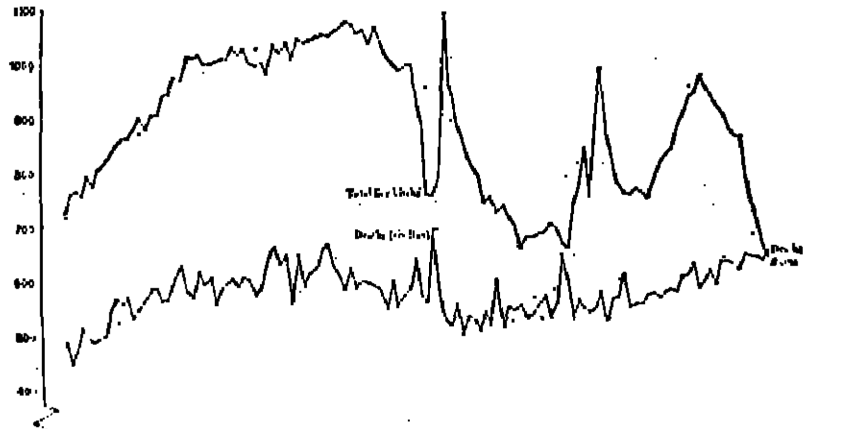
The OPCS says this may only be a temporary lull in the decline, as happened once before, or it may represent a flattening out, or even a rise in the number of births. In short, the population experts do not really know what is going to happen to the birthrate.

Demographers, both at the OPCS and the Government Actuaries Department, point out that just as factors combined to produce the unexpectedly rapid decline in births, so they could combine to produce a similarly rapid increase.

The availability of reliable contraception and the high cost of housing are among the factors thought to have encouraged the trends towards later marriage, smaller families and the deferment of children until several years after marriage.

Abortion law reform is also said to have played a part as this has meant fewer women have been forced to marry or start families against their wishes.

But the unexpectedness of this rapid decline should act as a warning for the future, the demographers say. Many couples in their late twenties or early thirties, who for economic or other reasons put off having children, could now decide to start their families, and the effect this would have on the birthrate could be even more dramatic if at the same time younger couples returned to the traditional pattern of having children earlier.



Live births and deaths, in thousands, between 1855 and 1975.

It is still too soon to see what long term effect the much greater and more widespread control over childbearing will have on the overall size of families. A fashion for having babies, perhaps with families having one or two more after a breathing space (rather as the Queen did), is not ruled out.

However, some increase in births is definitely expected over the next 10 years. The number of women of childbearing age is due to increase as the children of those born in the postwar bulge mature.

But just how great this increase will be, none of the experts will predict. Privately some of them guess that it will be considerably more than that which the straightforward increase in the number of fertile women might suggest and that it may come sooner.

What the demographers can be certain about, however, are the implications of the changes in population that have already occurred. They point out that the smaller age groups will affect the demands made on education and teacher training.

During the next five or six years more young people will be looking for jobs while fewer old people will be retiring.

The OPCS report says: "The relatively younger age structure of the working population should permit flexibility in the use of labour but it will also require more jobs to be created for the young and increased provision of training."

The trend towards smaller families will also mean more married women will be seeking employment and this has implications for the need to provide them with retraining and child care facilities.

The OPCS report also points out that though the birthrate among immigrants to the UK tends to be considerably higher, it seems to reduce to that of the indigenous population within about a decade of settling here. So there is a much lower birthrate among those of West Indian descent than in the more recently arrived Asian and African communities.

'Apathy' saps morale in Welsh schools

Apathy among teachers and pupils is affecting morale in Welsh comprehensives, Her Majesty's Inspectors say in a report published this week. The first of a series of discussion papers on education in Wales says that environmental factors in some areas have combined "to produce a general air of apathy, low expectation and attainment which has become pervasive and has sapped the morale of teachers and pupils alike".

Contributing to this, the HMIs say, are homes lacking in cultural stimulation, consistent love and care, moral standards and parental interest in education. Many pupils are confined to drab housing estates in communities that seem to accept truancy, delinquency and vandalism. After school, there is little hope of a job.

Nevertheless, some schools manage to make the most of the abilities of their pupils. The Welsh Office report, which concentrates on the first three years in the comprehensive, says careful attention to discipline, pastoral care, the monitoring of attainment and the constant encouragement to higher standards is needed. "An early taste of success can bring about a significant increase in self-esteem and confidence."

Referring to the conference the Welsh Office held earlier this year to discuss why fewer Welsh school-leavers had O levels or CSEs, the report says: "A vital first step is the realization by parents and pupils alike that each child is valued and known."

Schools have to show they are committed to every child's needs and welfare and that they expect an equal commitment in return. "Unless this climate can be established no amount of special teaching, apparatus, books, organization, testing or diagnostic procedures is likely to succeed."

The inspectors suggest regular meetings between parents and teachers. "It is unrealistic to expect schools to compensate completely for all the personal and social handicaps which their pupils exhibit; nevertheless, the evidence is that regular and positive intervention coupled with a deep sense of commitment can bring about a real growth in pupils' educational attainment and self-esteem."

At the Welsh Office conference there were complaints that Welsh comprehensives concentrated too much on the academic streams, leaving others to sink or swim. The inspectors seem to agree. "It is difficult for a comprehensive to foster a feeling of loyalty to an institution if in the main business of that institution, namely learning, clear and rigid distinctions are made about the learning opportunities offered to various categories of pupils.

"Such distinctions seem to be more keenly felt within the confines of a single school than they were when separate provision was made."

On the curriculum of years one, two and three, the inspectors complain that all children are taught subjects as though they are going to study them until the end of the fifth year, when in fact many drop certain subjects after the third year.

As a result many pupils stop doing history long before they reach the modern period. In other subjects children miss out on fundamental skills and attitudes because they only experience the superficial, factual approach of the first three years. "There is a need to determine what are reasonable objectives for the end of this period.

"The mere inclusion in the common curriculum in years one to three of a particular subject is no guarantee of the inclusion of essential bodies of knowledge, skills and attitudes."

The inspectors also say not enough money was provided for successive secondary reorganizations and raising of the school leaving age. Since 1944 the resources devoted to education had increased but "they have rarely been fully commensurate with the range of tasks laid upon schools and authorities".

Teachers must have wider cultural view

A major shift in English teaching methods and the use of a wider range of literature for a multicultural society is recommended by the National Association for the Teaching of English (NATE).

In a policy document just published it says that teachers must be knowledgeable about their pupils' linguistic, social, historical and cultural backgrounds if they are to "educate realistically for a multicultural society in a shrinking world".

It also urges teachers to have a more open attitude to language, to foster bilingualism, and to respect other languages and dialects.

Britain has always been a multicultural society but general educational practice has projected to pupils a very narrow view of what constitutes the culture of our country, says the document.

There is a wealth of literature written in English and in translation which serves as an introduction to diffferent cultures and it should be used, it adds.

NATE, which is urging other subject associations to take up such issues in their own work, is to produce a detailed discussion document to provide practical assistance for teachers.

Inventive auditions promise riches for National Festival of Music for Youth

The nationwide regional auditions for the National Festival of Music for Youth which takes place in Croydon on July 14, 15 and 16, have now been completed. Geoffry Russell-Smith, who has been adjudicating them, sends this report.

Due to weight of numbers it was decided that entries from orchestras and bands should, for the most part, be submitted on tape-recordings. Thus the live auditions were mainly by recorder ensembles, chamber groups and those playing in that all-embracing, polyglot category, instrumental ensembles. In all three one found young players not only scaling musical heights with apparent ease, but also successfully exploring new music and new ideas.

At last year's National Festival of Music for Youth . . . Doncaster Youth Jazz Orchestra.

Standards varied, but much was of high quality. Chamber music groups provided many of the highlights: the notorious eight-against-three semiquavers in Mozart's Oboe Quartet played by Chelmer Valley's young oboist with deftness and elegance; the quietly assured young ladies from Southampton gliding over the featherweight texture of a piece by Bozza for four flutes like an Olympic skater executing a double-axle; the Frenchness of Poulenc piquantly recaptured by the Gower Sextet.

There were riches indeed among the recorder groups, including many from junior and middle schools. The young musicians from Redlands (all 70-odd of them) were back, delighting everyone with their well-balanced and assured playing; and the ensemble from Murden Bridge who insisted they were "The Under Twelves" (not to be confused with the other group from the same school called "The Under Thirteens"), whose three little pieces by Holborne were played with such surprising maturity.

The general instrumental ensemble section produced an even greater variety of musical intentions—and indeed instruments—than usual. Here, for the first time, was the essentially twentieth century language of the synthesizer—two lads from Weston Park, Southampton, presenting a pleasing and memorable little work written by their music master, and combining artistic judgment with the appropriate technical skills.

And for tradition, what better than the handbell ringers of Patchway School in Bristol, who not only played pieces but also rang a Touch of Bob Major by the "lapping" method. This means that, instead of playing the changes as though they formed merely another melodic line, the ringers actually kept changing bells with each other according to the mathematical pattern involved. Thus the performance was a kind of musical weaving of an eight-stranded braid of sound, allowing the audience to follow and watch the individual bells passing from one player to another until, in triumph, the original scale sequence was reformed.

Add to this the cream of more than 300 tape recorded entries—including such surprising gems as a group of infant recorder players from Coed Eve in Wales who perform a piece by Haydn—and the signs for the national festival augur well.

The National Festival of Music for Youth is organized and presented by the Association of Musical Instruments Industries, and sponsored by The Electronic Organ Distributors' Association, the Piano Manufacturers' Association and The Times Educational Supplement.

Unions want church to have less say

by Paul McGill

The composition of school management committees in Northern Ireland should be changed to allow equal representation of education and library board members, parents, teachers and representatives of trustees or transferors, according to Northern Ireland's largest teacher union, the Irish National Teachers' Organization (INTO). But another union has proposed that management committees should be abolished altogether.

In its evidence to the Astin Committee on school management, the INTO argues that committees are unrepresentative of the interests involved in education, and most members lack even the simplest training in management techniques. "Appointments and promotions procedures give cause for serious concern, as do lack of accountability and inadequate communication."

The effect of the union's recommendation would be to cut the representation of the churches from over a half to a quarter.

The Ulster Teachers' Union has also told the Astin Committee that church involvement should be cut. It recommends a reduction to 17 per cent, putting the church on an equal footing with parents, teachers, education boards, district councils and community representatives.

The INTO submission proposes that a selection committee in each area education board, or its equivalent for voluntary or maintained schools, should interview candidates for the post of principal in all schools, and for senior teacher posts in large schools. The committees, consisting of two principles, two area board members, and two independent assessors, would advise management committees of the most suitable candidates.

It claims that, while the educational aims and ethos of a school are matters for management, "the implementation of the curriculum should solely be a matter for the professional judgment of the principal and the teaching staff subject to whatever advice is available from external sources".

The National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers goes further than the other unions, and recommends that school committees be abolished. Instead, financial and administrative functions should be exercised directly by the area boards, except where some responsibilities can be delegated to school principals. Professional functions should be firmly within the corporate control of the principal and other teaching staff.

The union argues that it is a legal fiction that school committees are involved in managing: that task is performed by the principal. The sole purpose is the appointment of teachers and their performance of this function "has confirmed the serious doubts of many teachers about the ability of lay management to assess the qualifications and merits of professionals."

The NAS/UWT accepts the need for a link with the local community and agrees that "parents have the right to comment on the education of their children, and their interest must be encouraged." To achieve this, it suggests the establishment of community consultative committees.

The menu for the future: chips with everything

In the past few weeks the newspapers have been spattered with tasteful hints of the most recent of the revolutions to engulf us—the microprocessor revolution. As in the revolutions we have lived through already, there are seemly rehearsals of the champions of change and of the neo-Luddites. On the one hand, both the National Enterprise Board and the General Electric Company Ltd have announced their intention of buying (or buying back) American technology so as to make Britain strong in microprocessors. And various trade union leaders, not to mention the Friends of the Earth, have uttered dire warnings about the consequences of microprocessors for people's chances of employment. The government, in the person of the Advisory Council on Applied Research and Development (Acard), has set up a committee to consider the pros and cons.

The real issue is unfortunately greater but also more subtle than has been recognized so far, in Britain at least. For if one thing is certain it is that the microprocessors will change the ways in which we live and work as profoundly as they were ever changed by, say, the steam engine or the radio wave. And that will happen more quickly than we can guess.

Microprocessor is, of course, a misleading name for the new revolution. In this context, processor means computer, so that microprocessor means small computer. Microprocessors are indeed small—tiny flakes of crystalline silicon a millimetre or so across which have been etched and deliberately contaminated with geometrical patterns of impurities so that each of them is capable of functioning as if it were a full-blown computer, the kind of thing that you might buy from IBM or even ICL.

The fact that microprocessors are small is however less important than that they are cheap. In the old days, in the 1960s, if you wanted to manufacture computers, you were obliged to recruit an army of people skilled at making electrical connexions between transistors with properties of different kinds. Now you can hope to accomplish the same result with clever design, some photography (for turning the circuit your designer wants into something too small for him to see) and some micrometallurgy (for manipulating the properties of the surface layer of a silicon wafer).

Historians will in future no doubt remark of this period in the history of the human race that it is impossible to tell when the revolution began. They will refer to Babbage (who proclaimed nearly two centuries ago that automatic computation should be possible) and to those like Hartree who in the 1930s actually made workable and useful computing engines. They (the historians) will note that between the mid-1930s and the mid-1970s there was a steady stream of prophecy to the effect that computing would change the world, and that nevertheless the consequences for the world we live in would not become apparent until the 1980s.

Science diary

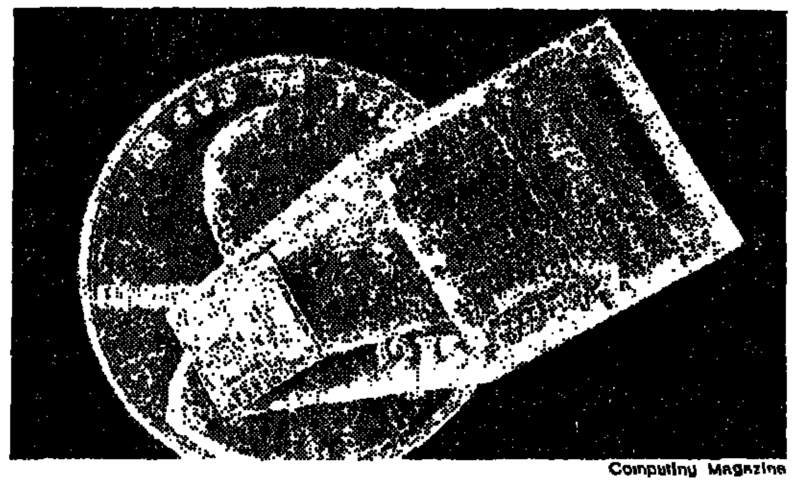
by

John Maddox

They will also note that the space programme (with its incessant search for more function from less weight) has been a powerful stimulus of the microprocessor revolution.

We know, or should know, that there is much more to be said. Although it has been clear for the past 20 years that the best computers are in principle the smallest (because electrical signals then travel most quickly between the working elements), it has taken a vast array of separate technical developments (not to mention a great deal of straightforward research in physics) to evolve the small wafers of silicon which are the equivalents of many (but not all) of the machines that the manufacturers used to sell.

The potential of these new devices extends far beyond the pocket calculators now to be found in every other school satchel.



Computing Magazine

A microprocessor shown actual size (on the coin) and blown up for detail. But it's the cheapness of these mini-computers, not their smallness which makes them likely to revolutionize how we live and work.

The most obvious development in prospect is that microprocessors will be used instead of the more expensive machines now in service but, for the manufacturers, that is only a relatively modest market. The big computer installations, those used for weather forecasting for example, need such large memories and such flexibility that conventional computers (which in any case rely on microprocessor components) will probably always have an advantage. The new devices will have other and newer uses. First, by their cheapness, they will bring substantial computer power within the reach of businesses and other organizations hitherto too small to afford computer installations of their own. Second, they will allow large organizations to build more flexible and powerful computer systems by distributing microprocessors throughout their operations, wherever data are generated or used. One benefit will be that the great sheaves of computer print-out paper, that at present are the hallmark of the computer age will become less conspicuous. What worries the trade unionists (and, fair play, others) is that many of the humdrum jobs of industry and commerce will disappear.

Fortunately, this potential use of microprocessors is by no means the most important in the long run. Like other technological innovations on this scale, microprocessors are important not because they make it possible to do existing jobs more efficiently and more cheaply, but because they will make possible functions that have hitherto been beyond people's reach.

A host of applications in telecommunications is easily foreseen. Automation will be given a further fillip. But the chances are that the applications which cannot be foreseen will be the most important. Put simply, by their cheapness, microprocessors have made it possible to supplement the power of thought in the way that steam engines supplemented the power of muscle.

How, then, should countries like the United Kingdom respond? What should the government do? Already there are people urging that the government should devise some way of keeping Britain immune from microprocessors. Alas, even if the country were prepared to forgo the benefits that the new revolution promises, immunity is impractable.

This no doubt is the spirit in which the National Enterprise Board has in the past few weeeks set up a company intended to develop and manufacture microprocessors in Britain. It is a worthwhile gamble but one that most probably will be of no avail—the Americans have too big a lead. The General Electric Company's plan to find ways of using microprocessors has more to commend it—if the range of applications is as great as people think, the result will be that the ingenuity of manufacturers all over the world will be taxed in devising ways of making and selling new kinds of machines. And this of course is the surest way, in the long run, of fending off the unemployment that microprocessors will otherwise bring.

Junior archer hits the championship

Fifteen-year-old Jackie Abbott first tried archery at a local sports gala.

by Stanley Levenson

The steady nerves and sharp eye of Jackie Abbott, a 15-year-old Leeds girl, brought her victory over her elders, in the British archery championships at Stoneleigh, Warwickshire. She was the first junior ever to win this event.

In the course of her success Miss Abbott, of Ralph Thoresby High School, set two new junior records—for the best Hereford round total on a single day (1,102 points) and the best for two days (2,177 points).

A Hereford round is six dozen arrows from 80 yards, four dozen from 60 yards and two dozen from 50 yards. On the first morning, with variable winds and visibility none too good Miss Abbott got on target. While most of her 60 rivals, including the Olympic squad, faltered she kept her nerve.

Archers work a long day, often starting at 9 am and not finishing until 7 pm. Although not all this time is spent shooting it is a considerable strain.

That is why fitness is important. Miss Abbott said she has a programme of exercises to keep fit and also does "a bit of athletics".

She began shooting about seven years ago after going to a local sports gala with her father, a pathologist. "There was an archery stall. We had a go and liked it" says Jackie. From then on they were hooked for Mr and Mrs Abbott are now also archers.

Jackie won her age group competition as a 13-year-old in 1976 and last year came second in the junior championship. Now, as senior champion, she is clearly a 1980 Olympic prospect. She was too modest to agree that she had some sort of right to go to the Moscow Games, but admitted that the hope of selection was "in the back of my mind".

Archery, at Jackie Abbott's level, is not a cheap sport. Her bow alone costs £140 and there are constant additional expenses, particularly travel. Fortunately Jackie benefits from a Sports Aid Foundation grant.

Three-in-a-row for Scottish golf winner

Colin Dalgleish, of Hermitage Academy, Helensburgh, won the Scottish schools golf championship for the third successive year at Carnoustie with a 36-hole total of 155.

This was one stroke better than A. Currie (Greenwood Academy, Irvine) and L. Mann (Carnoustie High School), who tied for second place. The contest, however, was not as close as the score suggests. Dalgleish had a lot in hand approaching the last hole. He made rather a mess of it, taking seven strokes but still won.

Dalgleish will not be in the Scottish team to play England in the first schools international, sponsored by Coca Cola, at the Crowborough Beacon Golf Club, Sussex, on Monday. He is going to spend the summer golfing in the United States.

The other members of the team to meet England are: D. Weir (Balwearie High School, Kirkcaldy); R. Fraser (Bearsden Academy, Glasgow); G. Miller (Clydebank High School); D. Ireland (Kirkcudbright Academy); M. Muirhead (Craigroyston High School, Edinburgh); W. Jack (Ardrossan Academy); W. Walker (Dumfries Academy), S. Allan (Marr College, Troon); G. Pook (Stirling High School) and G. Aitken (Lanark Grammar School).

The West Region (Dunbarton and Argyll), led by Dalgleish, also won the team event for the third successive year. Their three boys totalled 471 compared with second-placed Ayrshire's 480. The South West (Dumfries, Wigtown, Kirkcudbright) came third with 487.

The girls' championship over 18 holes, also at Carnoustie, was won by J. Connachan, of Preston Lodge High School, Prestonpans, with 77 strokes.

Weekend coaching plan for young table tennis players

A plan to catch and train young table tennis players as early as possible was announced last week by the English Table Tennis Association.

With the support of the Grand Metropolitan Hotel group the association is arranging a national youth training series — four weekends throughout the year when under-17s will be coached and assessed by the top association coaches.

About 150 boys and girls in two age sections (under-14 and under-17) will be nominated by the regions and by the Schools Table Tennis Association to take part in the series.

The players will stay at Grand Metropolitan hotels during their weekend in Birmingham, York, Newcastle and Crawley. This unaccustomed comfort will, says the association, allow them to concentrate on their game.

Coaching is the main element of these weekends, aimed at preparing the best youngsters for the British senior team, but the last of them, at Crawley, will also have a competition, says Mr Peter Simpson, trainer of the England team who is director of the new series.

The young player who benefits most from the series will be given a splendid trophy, a Silver Bat.

The association hopes that these weekends will bring all the best talent to the fore, make a contribution to the junior game and give England's future teams greater strength.

COURSES

There is still a Shortage of Mathematics Teachers

The Teaching Studies Department of the Polytechnic of North London offers for September, 1978, a one year full-time retraining course in mathematics for qualified teachers.

The aim of the course is to enable teachers to teach the subject with confidence throughout the secondary school.

Teachers employed by L.E.A.'s may be eligible for secondment on full salary. Newly qualified teachers are eligible for extension of grant and those teachers not at present in post may be eligible for Government assistance.

Further particulars about eligibility for financial assistance may be obtained from the D.E.S.

English and maths tests for university candidates from Clive Cookson, Our North America Correspondent

WASHINGTON

Compulsory province-wide testing of university entrance candidates in English (or French) and mathematics is proposed by the Ontario government in an important policy paper on the transition from secondary school to college or university.

The document, prepared by the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, assumes the retention of "Grade 13" as the final year of high school. Thus Ontario, Canada's biggest and richest province, will remain out of step with the rest of English-speaking North America, where secondary education ends at Grade 12.

Although there are arguments in terms of uniformity for stopping schooling at Grade 12 in Ontario too, it was evidently felt that the political repercussions of removing a year of secondary education would be too great at a time when, for demographic reasons, high school enrolments are beginning to fall.

However, the document does talk of Grade 13 specifically as a university preparatory year and not just as the fifth and final year of secondary education. Therefore its curricula and grading can be tailored for university entrance.

The Ontario government has circulated its "working paper" to the province's universities, colleges, schools and educational groups for comment. The Minister of Education, Thomas Wells, and the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott, are expected to convert its recommendations into formal government policy later this year, for implementation in 1979-80.

The paper says all Grade 13 pupils should have to write tests in their first language (English or French). They would include multiple choice questions and essays marked by secondary and post-secondary teachers.

The mathematics tests would be taken by all students enrolled in one or more Grade 13 maths courses. Everyone would do a general mathematical paper and additional papers on their specialist subjects (algebra, calculus, and relations and functions).

The new test can be seen as a partial reintroduction of Ontario's old Grade 13 examinations, which were abolished in 1967. However a government spokesman said they would be very different in form, with the emphasis on standardized testing of writing and maths, whereas the old exams were based on a set high school curriculum.

The working paper says the purpose of the proposed tests introduce "greater equity in ad sion to limited enrolment uni sity programmes".

A government research study the interface between second and higher education, on which paper is based, found "an app able variation in marks school to school". Since the a tion of the old Grade 13 exa examinations, university admis officers have had to rely em on these variable school marks the disadvantage of candid from schools with tougher ma policies.

Other proposals in the wo paper include:

- Establishment of eight st councils to improve coordin between the schools and universities and colleges on ma related to curriculum, stand and evaluation methods.
- A uniform scale of ma grades in universities, colleges schools.
- Government funding for uni sities and colleges to de "post-admission placement diagnostic tests".
- Withdrawal of funding f "preliminary year" program run by four universities a equivalent to Grade 13 a hi schools.

Emergency measures to help young jobless

from our correspondent

PARIS

Despite considerable cuts, the second national agreement on youth employment measures has been passed by the Chamber of Deputies.

First introduced in 1977 by M Christian Beullac, then Minister of Labour and now Minister of Education, the agreement is a series of emergency measures designed to reduce unemployment among French youngsters.

In 1976 unemployment among the under-25s stood at 8 per cent and, despite the massive effort devoted to the first agreement—some 55,000 young people were involved and a further 31,000 participated in training schemes — the prospect is gloomy.

According to M Robert Boulin, Minister of Labour and Participation, "between now and the end of the year the situation will almost certainly deteriorate further".

Generally speaking, the agreement involves the Government assuming the social security charges for young people under 25 who are taken on from the unemployment queue. Firms taking on young people also gain direct subsidies. The scheme is generally aimed at small and medium-sized firms. For instance, businesses with less than 500 employers on the payroll whose turnover is less than £11,750,000 a year receive 50 per cent of social security payments for each under 25-year-old they take on.

Other schemes involve six months' vocational training. Under such schemes the Government pays 75 per cent of the national average salary, currently reckoned at £245 per month, for those over 18 and 25 per cent for those under.

The priority of the second national agreement is to help young people seeking a first job. However, there have been considerable reductions in state support. Instead of paying all social security charges for apprentices, the second agreement only pays half. Vocational training periods have been cut from eight to six months.

The debate in the National Assembly saw attacks both from the Government benches and from the left.

Equally significant are the calls for improved guidance and counselling services in schools. The skills of young people, said a spokesman of the Union Pour la Democratie Francaise, closely identified with the President, no longer corresponded to the needs of the labour market.

Women losing out in hunt for work

from Colin Narbrough

STOCKHOLM

More young women than young m are seeking jobs in Sweden a p sent, according to a report by th Swedish Board of Schools.

The report is based on statis covering a period ending last Oc ber when 35,000 of the country under-25's were seeking work. Of these 57 per cent were women. The report points out that there we also 20,000 young people enga in emergency employment schem

Almost 60 per cent of seeking work had only prehensive school backg entering the labour market 16 years of age.

Young Swedes with gymna education were also among seekers with pupils fro humanistic-social studies forming the largest group parison with educational tives to gymnasium, such nical schools, indicates that completing mechanical, and building courses are represented among those work, together with people with short economics education.

West Germany

Minister calls for curriculum changes

by David Dungworth

A major debate in the Bundestag has revealed yet again the gulf between the federal government and the opposition on basic aspects of education policy.

Federal Minister for Education and Science, Herr Jürgen Schmude, produced a 60-page document containing statistics to substantiate his claim that the past 10 years had been a period of "outstanding achievement".

This could be seen particularly in the growing proportion of children from working-class homes with grammar school and higher education, in the enormous increase in expenditure on education and in the raising of the general and vocational qualifications of young people to their highest level so far.

Priority must now be given to consolidating these successes by far-reaching changes in administrative structure and the reform of study programmes in both secondary schools and universities, he said.

"The government," said Herr Schmude, deplored the limitations which selection at the age of 11 placed on pupils in their later choice of a career and therefore reaffirmed its commitment to the principle of comprehensive schooling and the extension of the "orientation stage".

This is the system adopted by some of the Länder under which pupils follow a common pattern of studies during the first two years of secondary education, and are not selected for grammar, intermediate or secondary modern school until the age of 13.

But Herr Alfred Dregger, leader of the CDU in Hesse, dismissed the government's claims on past progress, arguing that the federal public was now facing gradua unemployment on a massive sca and the job prospects for seconda modern school leavers [illegible] worse. He condemned the govern ment's approach to education as "ideologically orientated" and called for a critical reappraisal of the concepts on which its reform proposals were based.

Both sides in the debate indicated a greater willingness to take account of the wishes of parents, expressed in widespread demonstrations during recent months, especially on the controversial issue of comprehensive schools.

All parties agree that the most pressing problem is the need to ensure that sufficient jobs and training places are available for the "bulge" in school leavers over the next five years. They disagree, however, on the most effective method of solving it.

Indian education is to be re-organized yet again. A. S. Abraham reports

States object to new shake-up of system

At school in India. Is the syllabus too heavy ?

NEW DELHI

India is on the verge of changing the whole structure of its education system.

The present set-up, known as 10+2+3 (ten years of school, two in higher secondary school or junior college and three in university) is likely to be changed to eight years of school, four in higher secondary and three at university.

A conference of provincial education ministers will be called after the present session of parliament ends to discus the switchover. The federal education ministry has already circulated its plans and the conference is to get the various states to endorse them.

This is easier said than done. So far, one state, Gujarát, has decided to go along, but at least two others, Tamil Nadu in the south and West Bengal in the east, have objected.

The alignment is interesting: Gujarat is ruled by the Janata party, which is in power in New Delhi, whereas both Tamil Nadu and West Bengal are controlled by different parties ,a regional Tamil party in the one case, a Marxist one in the other.

So it could well be that Janata-ruled states, which are fewer than those run by other parties, will agree to the changeover, while the majority of states may not.

After Mrs Gandhi's emergency rule, the pendulum is swinging away from centralized authority to devolution in favour of the states. One sign is that the states are demanding more autonomy. Another is that the 45th Constitutional Amendment Bill, which seeks to undo Mrs Gandhi's 42nd Constitution Amendment Act, includes provision for returning education to the State List.

Objections to switching over from 10+2 to 8+4 are due not only to the sensitivity of states to federal encroachment on their powers. Even in Janata-ruled states, many teachers, managements, parents and students are full of misgivings because there does not seem to be any solid educational rationale for changing over.

The 10+2 set-up was introduced only recently.

Another objection is that the administrative, financial and educational problems of the switchover to the 10+2 system are by no means licked, but they are, by and large, under control.

One problem was that under the 10+2+3 system, the first-degree course at university was cut from four to three years. This meant that a lot of university-affiliated college teachers faced retrenchment or demotion. The problem was solved by making colleges as much as schools responsible for the plus-two stage.

But under 8+4, the plus-two stage, which will be incorporated in the new plus-four phase, will be the sole responsibility of schools. This means that university-affiliated colleges will have one year taken away from them and managements will have to think again about cutting down on staff.

Even if those retrenched are absorbed in schools, they will be reduced to being school-teachers and paid lower wages. It is dislocation of this kind, accompanied by resentment, frustration and militancy among teachers, that state governments fear they will have to experience all over again just when things were beginning to settle.

Dr. P. C. Chunder, the Education Minister, justifies the change by saying that the content of learning has been made more relevant and realistic and that the form is not important. Those opposed to another alteration reply that the content can be improved without changing the form so why is the form being changed ?

Dr Chunder also points out that a lot of schools had been complaining that under the 10-year curriculum, not even one-fifth of the students were able to pass examinations. This made it necessary to reduce the load on students.

However, some academics say that the evidence to show that the syllabus was unduly heavy is limited mainly to the experience in schools in the capital where 10+2 was introduced only in May 1975 and the first public examination at the end of class 10 was held in March 1977, the very month in which the Janata government took office.

But 10+2 had been introduced much earlier in several states (in the late 60s in Kerala in the deep south, in 1972 in Maharashtra in the west) and there the experience with examinations was nowhere near so disastrous. Some provincial governments feel there may have been inadequate administrative preparation or poor teaching for the changeover to 10+2 in the capital.

The emphasis under 10+2 was to be on vocationalization, especially at the plus-two stage.

Under 8+4, the objectives remain the same, but it is not clear whether vocationalization will begin directly after eight years of school or after a further two years of general education (in effect, the present ten-year school) under the plus-four set-up.

One distinction is important. Under the revised school syllabus, the academic load has been reduced in favour of "socially useful productive work", including "community service".

In February 1977, shortly before the election which brought the Janata party to power, Mrs Gandhi's government had launched a scheme to promote vocationalization in the states.

The present government has since got the scheme moving. By the middle of February this year, it had given money to 11 states to enable them to undertake district vocational surveys in 50 districts (administratively, India is divided tinto some 400 districts).

These surveys are meant to identify the fields in which vocational courses are most needed. In three districts in Karnataka in south India and one district in Sikkim, in the north-east, vocational courses have even been started.

At the plus-three stage, higher education, the least amount of preparatory work appears to have been done. By now appropriate three-year first-degree courses should have been drawn up and introduced at undergraduate level.

The latest report of the federal Education Ministry merely says that the University Grants Commission "has appointed a standing committee to advise it on the general policy regarding restructuring of courses of the undergraduate stage following the introduction of 12 years of secondary schooling".

The UGC's role in higher education has yet to be properly defined. There are proposals to make it a far more powerful body and higher education a much more centralized affair with the UGC holding the reins.

Employers offered subsidies

from John Richardson

THE HAGUE

Seventy milion guilders (£17m) has been allocated over the next three years to help school-leavers find work by the Minister of Social Affairs Dr William Albeda.

It is estimated that 220,000 young people, roughly the same number as last year, will leave school for good this summer. Many of last year's leavers are still unemployed (TES April 21 1978) and the youth unemployment rate of 20 per cent for those between 16 and 23 years compares unfavourably with the five per cent work.

Employers who are prepared to offer apprenticeship indentures in recognized crafts are to be eligible for a government subsidy of up to 100 guilders (£24) a week for each first year apprentice, and up to 50 guilders for second year apprentices.

The apprentices must be paid at least the minimum youth wage which, from July 1, will be 818 guilders (£204) per month for 16-year-olds, and 947 guilders (£235) for 17-year-olds.

Those who enter employment which has no recognized training programme are to have the possibility of practical training leading to craftsman status for two out of the five weekly working days.

The employers will receive a subsidy in compensation for those lost days of 100 guilders. The minimum wage for those who are to continue will be 490 guilders a month.

Amy Carter : 'logical move'

First Child changes schools

The most famous pupil in the Washington school system, Amy Carter, is moving from the mainly black school where she has studied since her father moved into the White House 18 months ago.

On the last day of term at Stevens Elementary School, the Carters announced that 10-year-old Amy will start the next academic year at Hardy Middle School, a mainly white school with a good academic reputation in one of the wealthiest parts of town, about three miles from the White House.

Hardy, like Stevens, is a public school (in the American sense) so President Carter will not lose the political credit he gained by trusting a child to a city school. But he will no longer be able to say his daughter attends a neighbourhood school.

According to the First Lady's press secretary, the Carters have been "very pleased" with Stevens, but they feel this is the logical time to put Amy in a middle school so that she will be settled for the next few years.

Anger over cash help for non-government sector

from John Kirkaldy

SYDNEY

Teacher organizations have reacted angrily to the federal government's recently announced financial guidelines which increase revenue for non-government schools but reduce it for government schools.

Overall there will be a one per cent increase in real terms, with expenditure on schools rising from A$625.2 million to A$631.6 million.

Grants for general recurring costs (mainly teachers' wages) to government schools remain the same at A$180.7 million, while rising by A$14 million to A$200.6 million for non-government schools. Capital grants to government schools are down by A$8.2 million to A$131.2 million, compared with a drop in capital grants to non-government schools of A$1 million to A$30.3 million. (There will be small increases in grants for migrants and multicultural education.)

The guidelines, which were announced by the Education Minister Senator John Carrick, are to be considered by the Schools Commission who will make recommendations to the government on the allocation of this revenue.

Mr Ray Costello, general secretary of the Australian Teachers' Federation, said it was "outrageous" that "the federal government will reduce its grants to governmental schools by A$8 million next year and increase its grants to private schools by A$13.5 million."

Mr Costello said that "on top of last year's reduction of A$14 million for government schools this further cut is a devastating blow".

Mr Lyn Davy, President of the ATF, said that he was particularly concerned about class sizes and programmes for disadvantaged school. He believed that the guidelines were an obvious policy of "elitism and sectionalism".

Senator Carrick defended the government's policy in terms of the economy and educational priorities. He said that the government was concerned at the size of Australia's budget deficit and that expenditure on education (nearly 9 per cent of total federal outlay) must be examined in this light.

"It is inevitable, therefore, that in the current economic situation the government, in the interest of maintaining a responsible overall fiscal policy, should exercise close control over educational expenditure", he said. The government have authorized an increase of 19.4 per cent to the technical and further education sector (TAFE), which will rise from A$97.6 million to A$116.5 million. This will provide school-leavers with more opportunities to obtain job qualifications.

Total federal aid to all sectors of education in 1979 will be A$1,894.1 million, a drop of A$800,000 (based on December 1977 price levels). The total allocation for Universities and Colleges of Advanced Education (CAES) is down from A$1,172 million to A$1,140 million.

Senator Carrick said there should be some real growth in total spending on education when the states make their contribution from the share of income tax they receive from the federal government.

Commercialized knowledge

Sir,—The discussion on the quality of information books in schools initiated by Margaret Spencer (April 21) deserves a wider airing, for books, after all, are one major means of acquiring knowledge. I find that the range and the quality of the books in a school suggests a good deal about the standard of knowledge available to the pupils.

Margaret Spencer's article is a plea to educational publishers for more information books written by experts, written for pupils and not for teachers, for fewer classwork books and more books which pupils can use by themselves.

The rejoinder by John Wilkes (May 20) suggests that such hopes are forlorn, indeed impossible, for the knowledge which can reach school pupils is already largely shaped by market forces. Any author will be "forced by word limits, themselves a consequence of commercial costs and processes, to use certain objectionable styles of writing."

I do not understand why only objectionable styles should sell, but points in both articles suggest that the only kind of knowledge our pupils will get in 1984 is the kind which packages neatly. This hardly ever produces a book which might inspire or stimulate a young reader. Yet some publishers do still manage to produce lively, suitable and informative books. It seems that it is educational publishers and school books which have especially got themselves enmeshed in commercial formulae.

John Wilkes goes on to suggest that school books are produced more for the teacher than for the pupils. It is the teacher who will direct the use of the books, interpret them, and make them intelligible: for, "who else can challenge the dogmatism of the textbook or any other sort of lie but the teacher?"

Many pupils can and do assess their school books accurately. They find them boring and do not read them unless coerced. Increasingly perhaps pupils get the mistaken idea that books are not a source of real knowledge. The problem here is the idea that the teacher must stand between pupils and books, that all books must also be "taught". Surely Margaret Spencer is right that the author must engage the reader directly? Teachers and publishers are intermediaries who can facilitate but may obstruct.

In the same issue of the TES Keith Gardner reports that the Schools Council survey on reading in secondary schools has found that the majority of textbooks used younger pupils are quite able. Moreover less than 10 cent of lesson time is spent on kind of reading. My own im sion is that it is difficult for one in a school to sit down for an hour uninterruptedly and book.

All of these things may connected. If so many school really are unsuitable then and teachers are quite right spend time on them. What happened is that reading has to be an important part of lea in schools so that pupils acquire nor practice the skills of using books to obtain ledge for themselves.

N and F: the one level option

Sir,—In their letter, Peter Hughes, Michael Baron, Andrew Bishop, Geoffrey Foxcroft and John Lewis, while welcoming the greater choice produced by N and F, question whether it leads to postponement of choice, point out that in the survey of 19 schools the increase in the number of pupils choosing physics, chemistry and mathematics is smaller than that predicted by a numerical scaling, and strongly support a four-subject one-level examination.

Mathematics appears to be particularly badly affected. Table III.5 (page 230) of the account of the survey ("Resource Implications of an N and F Curriculum and Examination Structure") indicates that in the 19 schools, of 406 A level mathematics candidates only 237 would have offered the subject to F level: a reduction of 42 per cent in the numbers offering the subject and 25 per cent in the time which those remaining would spend on it.

An N and F pattern in which F subjects are chosen during the first year of the sixth form course, and are separately taught in the second, will entail very considerable restructuring of the timetable between the two years, together with the splitting up and reforming of teaching units, making continuity of both class and teacher impossible.

I strongly support the four-subject single-level proposal coupled with an increased range of AO subjects for those with more limited academic aspirations.

R. W. PAYNE,
Deputy master,
Dulwich College,
London, SE21.

Evolution, not revolution

Sir,—The proposals regarding a new sixth-form curriculum with examinations in five subjects at N and F level should be rejected, or at least substantially modified, on the following grounds:

They are unnecessary: A level serves the academic candidate well at present; whatever modifications are required can be accomplished on an ad hoc basis—evolution not revolution. As regards the provision of sixth-form courses for less academic pupils, for which there is an evident need, these can be erected on the existing foundations, again on an ad hoc basis, thereby preserving the important principles of flexibility and freedom of choice on which, to some extent at least, the present system is constructed.

The proposals violate an essential principle of sound educational practice, namely that a teacher should teach a single, cohesive group. Where pupils pursue different objectives, such cohesion will be lost, with harmful consequences for teacher and pupil alike. One may occasionally teach combined groups: to institutionalize such a procedure would be indefensible.

Chaucer versus Chapman

Sir,—I would draw attention to two mistakes in the letter by Mr Farmer (June 9) which his confident tone, doubtless the rhetorical trick of a learned communicator, has concealed.

If Mr King had based his argument on the premise that "the works of Shakespeare, Chaucer and Milton are of greater value and worth than those of other writers" Mr King was on very solid ground. No one who has tried to read Lydgate, Chapman and Blackmore would deny that these are writers whose works are of less value and worth than those of Chaucer, Shakespeare and Milton. This trio have few rivals in English literature. Indeed, the only thing against them is their reputations which evokes on the one hand mechanical reverence and on the other facile sneering.

Mr Farmer's dogmatic insinuation that they are no better than the other writers, even though it comes from a man with a little influence in education, need cause no alarm. Since it must surprise us into making comparisons very favourable to the great authors this doctrine should serve to revivify our jaded appreciation. Iconoclasm, even stupid iconoclasm, has its uses.

Mr Farmer's second mistake has more serious implications since it must flatter a schoolmaster's pride instead of shocking his sensibilities. He asks whether Mr King is suggesting that the study of other writers' works . . . will not produce high standards of work. This is a pedagogue's reduction of the critic's fallacy: provided the criticism is good, it does not matter what the text is like. My counter proposition is that human life, and more particularly the period of human life given to the study of letters, is too short to literature, however cleverly write about it.

Pupils are in no position to the authors they shall study they are necessarily ignorant English literature. Their choice only be based on narrow and prejudice. It is the duty teachers to introduce them which join with duty.

A canon of sixth form necessary only if we anticipate ure in this duty through idleness whimsicality. Vexatious and ing such a canon would be, should prevent any pupil from cheated out of his literary by a lazy or cranky teacher.

Mr Farmer's letter demonstrates how easily such a fraud could defended by a skilful communicator.

Overselling the IB

Sir,—Each time I read and hear about the excellence of the International Baccalaureate, I wish that its advocates would learn to stick to facts. Your correspondent Gabriel Green trots out the familiar statement that the IB "opens the world to students".

The world of higher education is already open to holders of appropriate GCE qualifications. In fact, as well as "in principle" (to quote Mr Green), European, Commonwealth and other universities accept O and A levels as normal entry qualifications. My American School counterpart here says: "Of course you are so lucky to be able to offer GCE to parents who want their children to qualify for university anywhere."

This is a plain fact. The drivers of the IB bandwagon should put their wheels more firmly on the ground and face the fact that an internationally accepted university entry qualification already exists. The only additional qualification wanted is an ability to understand the language in which lectures are delivered. The relevant point is whether the IB has sufficient merit to be worth adopting.

C. BUCKLEY,
Headmaster,

Parents' right to choose

The last sentence of the letter about Kent's secondary reorganization printed on June 2 from Mr J. A. Skinner, head of Maidstone School for Boys, should have read: "Sad will be the day for English education if systems are condemned for advocating too much parental support."

Letters for publication should arrive by Tuesday morning at the latest. They should be as short as possible and should be written on one side of the paper only. The editor reserves the right to cut or amend them if necessary.

Best texts first

Sir,—Clearly I did not communicate effectively with Paul Farmer, head of faculty of communication studies, in my letter (May 26) about the N and F proposals.

I was not mainly concerned with the study of Shakespeare, Chaucer and Milton, as opposed to other writers, but with the undoubted reduction in teaching time for more able literary scholars and the need often to teach them in mixed-ability groups, where the pace and level of the work is likely to be reduced.

I do not have Mr Farmer's implicit faith in the ability of teachers to choose texts wisely and representatively and wonder how one ensures comparability of standards if choice is left to each individual school. Cross-moderating of mode 3 schemes can pose monumental problems. Examination boards generally offer a wide and balanced choice, nate texts one would not thought of for oneself and one to embark on the study authors who enrich one's own ary knowledge and understanding.

Finally, yes, I am concerned too many English teachers see the subject in terms of twentieth-century literature, frequently with sociological bias, rather than ing the richness and diversity major works of literature through the ages.

Tutors for teachers

Sir,—In "The cost of common sense" (June 2) Norman Evans highlights an area which requires both money and hard thinking but not necessarily in that order. Staff development in schools has suddenly become a vogue term and we must beware that it does not become discredited because it is perhaps the soundest investment we can at present make in education.

A first step surely is the appointment and training of teacher tutors in large schools in the same way that a school might have a youth or community tutor. In my own case we have developed school based in-service work which often only caters for a very few staff and which complements other programmes.

In addition we recognize the need for a staff development policy and use every opportunity to give staff wider experiences. Furthermore the l.e.a. has successfully used serving teachers in INSET activities.

Much of industry and commerce already produce their own training personnel and it would seem that a corporate enterprise using serving or seconded teachers as teacher tutors, along with advisers and higher education should be a sound investment of time and money.

Three-year probation

Sir,—Isn't it time that the probationary year was extended to two, or even three years? That first, difficult year in the job is largely spent acquiring useful experience, but apart from that rare animal, the born teacher, most of us take much more than a year before we are ready to make a really positive contribution based on experience gained.

It is sometimes said that incompetence is no reason for dismissal: that those who appoint fools do themselves exhibit the greater foolishness. This is unfair. Heads and inspectors have been known to back hunches and to pass a teacher who has had a very bad first year, but who is expected to improve in attitude, approach, teaching technique, etc. Some hunches pay off; others fail. It can never be a matter of exact science.

But an extended probation of two or three years would pay off in the long run. The teacher entering his fourth year would be a man of proven worth. A profession staffed entirely by such people would be unlikely to offer fools for selection to headships. (I am told by the press that at present such appointments are made from time to time.) And there would be less need to talk of fixed contracts for head teachers . . .

Study in frustration

Sir,—Having at my great age of 50 years studied nine months for the C and G Adult Tutors Certificate 730 and been bitten by the adult education bug, I now find myself, apparently, stranded without any prospect of reaching my goal of obtaining a full-time position in this field.

I have been tutoring A level two-term courses since 1973 in one subject and since 1977, have also been providing tutorship in another. The number of courses dealt with during the past five years is over 20 and the total number of students catered for exceeds 3,000, for I have been operating in a minimum of four education centres each year.

It seems that because I am not a qualified teacher of children any application for a suitable position within the FE or AE fields is considered as useless, yet among the organizations to whom I have lectured are such august bodies as technical colleges, FE centres and universities.

Unfortunately there is a restrictive attitude towards academic qualifications in the two fields in which I specialize, but surely there is some way in which an enthusiastic individual with several years' practical knowledge of tutoring and administration can satisfy his desire? The ATAE (Association of Tutors in Adult Education) admit that they are unable to assist in any way, but perhaps there are other readers who suffer from the same frustration?

Ways to literacy

Sir,—In her letter concerning my Talkback article on literacy teaching at home, Patricia Jenkins (June 9) remarked that it was not constructive to argue against class teaching and that we should do our best to offer and publicize both class and individual tuition. The whole point of my article was to do just this, and to repair the growing imbalance between the services on offer caused by the present trend away from individual and towards class tuition in schools and colleges.

If there is a high success rate for those students who are sufficiently motivated to attend classes regularly, this does not cancel out the high drop-out rate of those who do not receive the personal and individual attention they need.

Training: racial time bomb?

Sir,—The Polytechnic of North London and City and East College has embarked on an explosive and retrograde course which will affect both education and race relations. ("First course for black teachers", June 2.) The acceptance of West Indian candidates into teaching without the basic entry requirements and after a one year "course" smacks of the type of benevolence we could well do without.

Education is a slow and tedious process which becomes apparent only after years of training and study. It would be to the ultimate disadvantage of West Indian teachers to submit for training under this system. It is obviously a dupe devised to keep black teachers to the lowest round of the professional scale. Those who are the product of this plan will be so occupied being grateful, that professional standards will suffer.

One of the most dangerous trends is the blanket concept which will eventually encompass all West Indian teachers. At the moment, highly qualified and efficient West Indian teachers are deliberately being ignored on the promotion ladder. This plan gives carte blanche to this noxious attitude on the part of some officials. I could clearly see the day when properly qualified black candidates would have to give way to the docile; the amenable; the pursuadable; the obtuse; the unqualified. It is, in my opinion, a deliberate attempt to create this image of the black teacher and vitiate standards among them.

Apart from this negative effect on education, its effect on race relations could be disastrous. Black teachers will be exposed to the justifiable prejudices of parents. In more extreme cases, racialist factions will seize this opportunity to debase black teachers. Unqualified indigenous candidates will have every right to expect the same facility.

It is generally felt in our society that educational standards have suffered over the last two decades. This regrettable plan—to accommodate black teachers with less than the required standard of entry—would ultimately focus the limelight on them as the reason for these failures. We are an integral part of British society. In this capacity, any move to lower our standards—as against that of the indigenous teacher—will be taken as a direct attempt to eventually make us the scapegoat for educational failures.

As a black parent, I strongly object to my children being educated by any but those with the standard entry and professional qualifications. I call on all parents to object to this naive and dangerous plan. After all, it is our children's future we are talking about. We must not allow our children to be used for the socio-educational experiments of do-gooders.

Response to the multi-culture

Sir,—Aristides, in the form of an apparently serious journalist from the TES, joined conversation with me recently, and with a certain single-mindedness changed its direction to the issue of a proposed Schools Council development in multi-ethnic education. The gossipy tone of the writing in this piece ("If at first you don't succeed", June 9) while annoying and trivializing, was not enough reason to use precious time to write a letter. However, finding myself misquoted and out of context, I do.

May I, for the record, state that I believe there is a need for a careful, thorough and sharp compilation of curriculum, and other, developments in multi-ethnic education. From such a base, appropriate further development can usefully start.

My position here is unambiguous; the urgent need is to develop appropriate responses in multi-cultural education for all and to meet properly the educational requirements of all ethnic groups. Where research and the development of strategies, approaches, courses and materials assist, they are to be encouraged.

Certainly it would be a waste of time and money to replicate what had already been done and to ignore the findings, of recent developments including the Schools Council project: Education for a Multi-Racial Society. I hope this makes more sense than the words attributed to me earlier.

Victims of IQ

Sir,—Dennis Stott's forthcoming book ("Enter prophet for whom learning is the only test", June 2) is only another nail in the coffin of the death of IQ exponents whose illconceived theories and so-called findings were designed to besmirch the education of our black children in British schools. West Indians like myself who have been writing constantly denying the validity of such tests see Dr Stott's work as a genuine attempt of a serious social scientist elucidating truth, rather than finding scapegoats for denigrating Black West Indian children.

West Indians wholeheartedly support his belief "that psychologists should abandon time-consuming measurement and tests, and work with and through teachers, assessing faulty learning styles and working to remedy them"

Jobs: no answer, was the reply

Sir,—My colleague Mr Gwilliam's letter (June 9) about non-interviews prompts me to add an anecdote which might provide food for thought.

The other day a former pupil dropped in for a chat. She has just completed her certificate course for junior teaching at a prestigious institution and is precisely the kind of enthusiastic, committed and intelligent young teacher whom I welcome the chance to appoint to my own school.

I asked, braced to offer whatever empty consolation I could contrive, whether she had been successful in finding a post. Yes, was the reply, in the junior department of an independent school. Had she any reservations, I wondered, about forsaking the maintained sector? None, any longer . . . not one of her applications to a maintained school or l.e.a. had even been acknowledged.

The reason—or excuse—for the practice is obvious enough, but is this kind of economy really worth the sacrifice of elementary courtesies?

Why exam boards keep A level paintings

Sir,—Telephone conversations have their drawbacks as a reliable means of communication and I have not been able to trace the conversation reported by "Frustrated Parent" in his/her letter of June 9. The reason which "Frustrated Parent" claims to have been given for paintings not being returned to A level candidates (if the examiners write comments on them?) is however certainly not the main one.

The paintings are retained by the board because they have been executed under examination conditions and are therefore regarded in exactly the same way as written work done in the examination room. On the other hand coursework, written or practical, which has been submitted for assessment is returned because it can be regarded as the property of the school or the candidate.

The differentiation has been made by the JMB Examinations Council which, as a body on which practising teachers in schools and colleges taking JMB examinations are in a large majority, is well aware of the issues involved and has discussed them many times.

Part of a comic strip from the 'Schools ain't what they used to be' section of It's a Matter of People.

Jane Thompson argues that social studies 'has miserably failed to create the tolerant, thoughtfully critical and socially conscious pupils we all hoped for'

Teaching social studies is in many ways a harder job than it seemed to be 10 years ago. This is partly because the shift to comprehensive education has brought together a wider cross-section of students under the same roof. The problems caused by this are enormous, but they are not new.

Working class pupils have always known that 11 years in full-time education scarcely equips them with the academic skills or enthusiasm for study which makes their time in school seem worthwhile. Most of the current furore about "declining standards" is because, for the first time, the parents of middle class children have had to face the consequences of an inadequately financed system, and experience much more closely the effects of disruption when large numbers of pupils are alienated from what schools represent.

In the general retreat from liberal ideas of "equalizing opportunity" and "reforming society" through comprehensive education, the "declining standards" argument now provides the stick to beat down and clear out dilettante, hybrid integrations like social studies, in a great leap back to single-subject disciplines. Except of course for "less academic" pupils, those who have shown themselves to be failures in terms of the traditional curriculum, social studies, humanities, integrated studies, or whatever their equivalent might be, are still frequently justified in terms of their immediacy and "relevance to the needs of less able pupils".

Ten years ago the new social studies was in a stronger position. It was welcomed as the curriculum solution to motivating and interesting "Newsom" and "ROSLA" pupils. But it also enjoyed an additional boost because curriculum innovation was in vogue, and social studies promised to enliven and enhance the rather tired and unfashionable images of its old rivals, history, geography and RE.

A significant number of schools decided to teach social studies across the board in the early years of secondary school. Some introduced mode 3 CSEs and O level in an attempt to preserve mixed ability teaching into the fifth year, or at least until the repercussions of ROSLA and the standards backlash put paid to most of these developments.

There has been another problem, however. Despite its apparent relevance and interest to youngsters, and the radical claims that are made about it by its defenders, a lot of social studies teaching has proved in practice to be as irrelevant to the interests of pupils as any other subject, and has miserably failed to create the tolerant, thoughtfully critical and socially conscious pupils we all hoped for.

Part of the trouble has been the legacy of citizenship courses, and the view that schools should be creating quiescent, as distinct from questioning, democrats. The minutiae of institutional detail like "the number of MPs in Parliament", "the duty of Black Rod", and "the name of the Lord Mayor", is still too much the content which has to be learned. Topics like "People Who Help Us", featuring the police and social workers, often don't fit in with youngsters' personal experience of these people.

"How to go about getting a job" usually emphasises the accommodations the pupil has to make to please the employer, rather than questioning the inordinate amount of influence and control industry seems to have over the schools. And it's never explained why, even when you do everything according to the book, one in six school leavers can still expect to be unemployed through little fault of their own.

Too often the emphasis is on cohesion, on learning your role and fitting into society. Much of the content and many of the texts are both patronizing and limiting, which is also the main reason why pupils reject them. As in so many other subjects, they still smack of knowledge which is the teacher's, not theirs, and facts which do not correspond much to their own experience.

In this kind of relationship, to question can actually be considered deviant. In a lesson I observed recently a black 14-year-old asked why unemployment was highest among black school-leavers, to be told that, with that kind of chip on his shoulder, it would be his own fault if he did not get a job.

Projects, the hallmark of social studies teaching in action, are rarely the pupils' own contribution to inquiry and understanding, whatever the technique might claim. It is too easy for an overworked teacher to settle for cut-out pictures and copied text as a substitute for independent and personal study, when class numbers make individual teaching difficult. Pupils can escape a good deal of hassle and the interference of having to think for themselves if they settle for going through the motions of the activity in a reasonably quiet and neat way.

But of course this is not good enough. The issues raised in social studies are important. Society is not a given commodity which can be described and measured, but not challenged or altered. Learning which is not intimately related to the business of action hardly deserves the description education.

The fact that social studies is now mostly confined to the curriculum of younger and apparently "less able" pupils makes this principle even more important. Since we know that class factors still play a major part in definitions of low achievement, we must be sure that what we teach is contributing to liberating our pupils from their labels, rather than tailoring them to fit better.

But this is not meant only to be a cynical and unhelpful commentary on what hundreds of teachers teach and thousands of pupils spend their time being taught. It would be arrogant and misleading to suggest that many teachers are not fully aware of the difficulties of trying to translate the ideals of pupil-centred learning into practice, or of working with their pupils to develop skills which will enable them to transform the status quo rather than merely accept it.

School texts are possibly not the best place to start. But since hundreds of different ones are used, and the vast majority fall in the ways I have suggested, I would like to comment on the approaches used in It's a Matter of People and Studying Society, as potentially helpful additions to pupils' and teachers' own resources in social studies lessons.

It's a Matter of People is intended for 13 to 14-year-olds beginning a social studies course, though I can imagine it being used very profitably with older pupils in nonexamination groups. The approach is very visual and lively and makes full use of humour, cartoon and original source material.

Each theme begins close to the pupil's own experience, but broadens out to wider issues, and presents potentially difficult material in a simple and accessible way. There is a wealth of activities for pupils, and lots of scope to expand and vary the material for maximum effect.

Studying Society is for CSE pupils. Again the emphasis is on pupil activity and finding out by doing. Simulations, investigations, urban trails and out-of-school activities are just some of the ways used to encourage pupils' involvement and independent research. A good deal of help is given so that the tasks do not appear daunting or impossible, but they remain open-ended so that pupils are genuinely involved in creating knowledge for themselves rather than arriving at predetermined conclusions.

Controversial subjects are notoriously difficult to teach because of their very familiarity and consequent over-simplification. So often a class discussion can be merely the rehearsal of prejudice and misinformation, rather than interpretation based on the evaluation of different evidence. In topics like inequality between the sexes, community action, industrial relations and school experience, I've tried to include the stimuli which will provoke further investigation before opinions are too readily confirmed.

I hope that both books will be helpful to teachers, and provide the kind of material from which pupils really can become active learners, and which can be flexible despite all the timetabling and syllabus restrictions that can conspire to thwart our more adventurous ideas.

But more than that, I hope youngsters will actually enjoy the books, and feel they were produced with them in mind, to be fun, but demanding, so that their horizons aren't lowered. And to be provocative, so that they don't learn to accept uncritically the dogma of the moment, without realizing its limitations or being able to escape its restrictions.

Jane Thompson is a lecturer in education in the department for adult education, University of Southampton. It's a Matter of People and Studying Society were published last month by Hutchinson.

Dismal catalogue

A report documenting the underachievement of black children in one authority's schools has provoked a bitter response amongst teachers and parents. Caroline Haydon reports from Redbridge

A year ago in the comfortable London suburb of Redbridge, angry parents confronted teachers and education officials at a packed meeting in a local hall. They demanded to know why their children were falling behind at school.

The parents were West Indian. Was it racial prejudice in the schools that was holding their children back? Accusations flew back and forth. The meeting became very heated. An education official categorically denied that West Indian children were doing badly, and teachers stoutly maintained there was no racial prejudice in Redbridge schools.

Recently the scene was re-played. Parents, teachers and councillors again crammed into a local hall. But the mood had altered. This time there was general agreement that there was a problem. Some teachers were more inclined to the view that society's prejudices inevitably filter through to schools.

What had caused the change was a slim 21-page report which had proved the authorities wrong. Called Cause for Concern, and prepared by the local community relations council and a black pressure/self-help group, the Black People's Progressive Association (BPPA), it gave Redbridge quite a jolt. It should also provide food for thought for other authorities.

Briefly, it exploded the myth that multi-racial education is something only inner cities have to concern themselves with. Redbridge has a comfortable Conservative council majority and no slums. Its West Indian population (some two per cent) is largely well-integrated and active in the local community. The chairman of BPPA only just missed winning a seat on the council.

And yet, the report showed, local Asian children were doing worse at school than white children. And West Indians in turn were doing worse than the Asians, many of whom had quite serious language difficulties. The parents' fears were justified.

The results were obtained quite easily after a brief skirmish with the council, which was finally persuaded to undertake an ethnic analysis of its survey results for fourth-year juniors. These consisted of verbal reasoning, English and maths tests, taken last summer by all the borough pupils in the last year of junior school.

Minority group performance in eight multi-racial schools was tabulated. With the tests standardized to a mean of 100, white children showed up scores well into the 90s. But West Indian children on average scored 85 for verbal reasoning, 88.6 for English, and 86.1 for maths.

A back-up study from Loxford High School, a large comprehensive with about one-third ethnic minority pupils, told the same story. Although 27 per cent of all first year pupils required remedial help, the proportion among West Indian first-years was 46 per cent.

And at Loxford exam results showed that the average number of O level and CSE grade 1 passes was 0.7 per cent for the whole school, but only 0.3 per cent for West Indians. The comparative number of O level and CSE passes at all grades were 4.2 and 1.0 respectively.

To complete the dismal catalogue, it was found that although West Indians represented 10 per cent of the Loxford school population, not one passed a single A level in 1977.

The report also confirmed that West Indians were over-represented in local ESN and remedial units, where they numbered 8.3 per cent. Yet they make up only 2 per cent of the school population.

What really stirred things up in the borough, however, were the reasons the report gave for this failure. Rejecting the theory that black children are innately less intelligent than white, it put forward a number of contributory factors. It acknowledged that blacks often had to overcome the difficulties of settling in a new country—but that applies to few Redbridge West Indians, where it is the generation born and educated there which is failing to make the grade. It also pointed out that the difference in West Indian background, speech and culture caused problems. A child's use of Creole could hold it back if a teacher labelled it as deficient, not just different.

But it landed the blame for the black children's failure fairly and squarely on the hostility the children faced in a racist society. The "development of a negative self-image", and the resultant poor self-identity, it said, could lead to a lack of confidence, and a reduction in motivation which in turn could affect school work.

Surely not in Redbridge? Certainly, says a community relations officer, Ian Martin. Its minority groups may be well integrated, but Redbridge has its own murky past—race stabbings two years ago, the harassment of a Pakistani newsagent, "the only Pakistani for at least two miles around"—that sort of thing. It is a mistake too often made, he says, to assume that racism just happens in "deprived" areas, and that all is sweetness and light out in the more gracious suburbs.

But the report went further. Members of the working party "were disturbed to find that on a number of occasions . . . the names of Jensen and Eysenck were mentioned quite spontaneously by local teachers".

That was a paragraph which did not go unremarked. Stung into anger, an NUT official denounced such allegations as "unfounded" and "an insult" in the union paper The Teacher. The question of just how far teachers would accept the "racist" label dominated the second meeting, just as the angry parents had dominated the first. Rows of black parents sat largely silent, while white teachers defended their profession as one where "all children, black and white, are treated the same", and yet others attacked that view as colour blind.

Favourite anecdotes were dusted off and brought out. One kindly teacher, who believed in the "treat-black-and-white-alike" theory, gave herself away, a colleague observed, when she said she would not have children reminded they were black in her classroom. The reason she gave was that it would be as cruel as reminding a child who was a thalidomide victim that he was crippled.

Such bickering has only saddened the people who produced the report, who see that bandying accusations must ultimately become counterproductive, and destroy concentration on the disturbing trends indicated.

They believe, however, that teachers need to look more closely at their typed views of West Indians as " ous and noisy", "disruptive", lazy" or "aggressive and colour-co with chips on their shoulders" (al from the report). What was they said, was the generally idea that such behaviour was " to blacks, and there were no ex to such "rules". The idea that outside social factors might be in producing such behaviour wa hinted at.

They also want teachers to carefully the implications of every child the same, and ignor whatever well-motivated reason, ground. Finally, they want careful sal of teacher expectations. If the sees the academic West Indi contradiction in terms, how fa a self-fulfilling prophecy?

More formal recommendation the setting up of a council-ru to confirm the findings, and resource and training centre teachers help the children; an courage the view that blacks in the classroom as well as on field.

Such specialist help has not be coming so far because the nee West Indian child have been di pinpoint and cater for. It has easier to respond to the needs of whose language problems we spotted and fairly easily dealt wi

Yet, says the report, ironically the West Indians who need m than the Asians. The latter h markedly separate culture to them and provide an alternative but the West Indians, com background with strong B ences, have no such ready-ma tive.

Neither the community rela cil nor the BPPA can be very that their recommendations w high priority in a borough, wh has been focused on a campai two local grammar schools.

They have, however, ensured Redbridge arguments about ra been brought out for an ai of simmering quietly, insidio spoken. For how long, and result, remains to be seen. As says, the first step towards is the acceptance that there and they have just about go Not many authorities have do

Putting heads together

How do you help headteachers keep in touch with practice in schools other than their own? Christopher Griffin-Beale sits in on an unusual in-service course

Every Tuesday during the past school year, a small group of primary heads from Lincolnshire and South Humberside have met at Bishop Grosseteste College, Lincoln. They are on an in-service course for senior primary staff, involving visits to schools as far afield as Oxfordshire and Yorkshire.

When I sat in, they were discussing their visit on the previous Tuesday to schools in inner Leicester, whose efforts to serve a multi-ethnic population were quite outside the professional experience of most Lincolnshire staff.

Next month, several dozen heads and advisers, "graduates" of a similar course, the Plowden course at Goldsmiths' College, meet for their annual reunion in Dunmow, Essex, renewing a network of contacts that spans a decade.

The similarity between the courses is no coincidence. Len Marsh founded the Plowden course at Goldsmiths' alongside the postgraduate primary course. In 1974, a year after his arrival at Lincoln as college principal, he transplanted the concept to Lincolnshire, where the new course has naturally taken, with a much more closely defined geographical constituency than its London precursor.

Both courses, however, owe much in turn to the model of the one-year full-time course—a kind of educational equivalent of the Civil Service Staff College—which the late Christian Schiller ran at the London Institute of Education for a decade, after his retirement from the inspectorate in 1955. Len Marsh is just one of its former students now in senior positions in the system.

Apart from visiting speakers (many themselves heads) and school visits, the advanced course at Lincoln relies substantially on discussion among course members. Unlike many courses committed to specific—often administrative—skills for heads, this course lacks a conventional syllabus structure. Its organization is [illegible] attuned to the primary philosophy with which it is associated. It provides a wealth of experiences of other schools, other practices, other theories.

What course members derive from it depends on what they bring to the course, and the connections they make with their past and present experience. Len Marsh thinks it is important that it is not a full-time course: heads return to their own schools every Wednesday morning. That, he reckons, keeps discussion practical, and related to that experience in their own schools.

But the lack of structure is only apparent. The experiences are guided through the choice of schools and speakers, their sequence through the year, and, of course, the contributions from the course tutors themselves. Len Marsh maintains a close involvement, attending most sessions in college.

The other tutor is the college's head of professional studies, Leslie Bowler, sitting in for the regular tutor, Alan MacIntyre, who has stepped into the breach at the local teachers' centre, which was temporarily warden-less.

One of the heads on the first Lincoln course, John Pykett from Gainsborough, reckoned that part of the benefit was simply in "talking among ourselves" in seminar discussions, also over l coffee in the college staff common

Indeed, heads can be doubly is They share the traditional isola teachers, trapped in their own class or school with little opportuni observe other practitioners.

But heads are liable to further i tion through their position of autho This may be less of a problem for p heads. And it may not affect "te heads" in small village schools; bu they face another problem, for com commitment to a particular cla leave them less time to think abo school as a whole.

For the first part of the mo group exchanged notes about their vations in Leicester, and questi Leslie Bowler, formerly in the adv service there, who arranged the vi usual, they had divided visiting different pairs of schools schools welcome an invasion of dozen heads at once.

The schools' educational problems w largely new to them. They were intrig by the contrasting responses and p ties of schools they visited—some em sizing standards of achievement remedial help, others multi integration. One head was struck b "politeness" and "docility" of children in one crowded playground, paring it favourably with his own, smaller village school.

Later in the morning, the m speaker, John Emanuel, head of Wych, a rural Hertfordshire primar Sawbridgeworth, arrived with case children's work—art-work and project folders the children had bound themselves, integrating observational and imaginative work in writing and a myriad of artistic media.

John Emanuel is fantically interested in modern poetry. As he talks—describing his school, its setting, philosophy and practice—it is hard to distinguish his own heightened prose from the many quotations from modern verse.

The ensuing discussion lasted the rest of the day. The heads were interested in practical matters: how were particular effects achieved, how did he arrange for children to be able to use paint whenever they wanted, why did he prefer giving them tempera blocks rather than powder paints (easier for children to mix them—one of his priorities), how did he choose the sewing machines that the children use to such creative effect?

The heads were also interested in external pressures—a hint of preoccupation with pressures, from above and outside, for more testing. John Emanuel insisted he had not operated substantially differently in the days of the 11-plus. One head asked how would he answer a parent who said: "What about tables?" He was unperturbed, pointing to the value of the mathematical work, for instance with magic squares, that his children do.

But Len Marsh took the discussion in a different direction. He wondered if the problem wasn't that teachers, especially heads, felt pressured into giving an immediate answer to such a question. This could be a trap. A parent asking such a question already knows the answer he wants to hear, and no teacher wants to deny that tables are important.

The problem is how to explain the school's perspective, the relationship between skills and understanding, a strategy whereby children will gain a foundation of mathematical understanding and enthusiasm as well as an eventual knowledge of tables.

There is a technique in not giving an answer immediately, he suggested, a technique exemplified in the skill (often unconscious, and unexamined) of the good nursery teacher, who never answer's a child's question directly, but asks other questions, leading the child in a particular direction. Why are teachers so good at doing that with children, but sometimes less good with other adults and parents? Perhaps, as many in the room acknowledged, they are happier dealing with children than with adults.

Later a head asked about music, which John Emanuel had not mentioned. He replied that his school had music-making with recorders and tuned percussion, but he would like more. The head said he had not been good at music, and was concerned about children in the school like himself, who might not appreciate the emphasis on art, but could get satisfaction from using their voices.

From the ensuing discussion it was clear this topic had arisen before. There was much debate about different approaches to school music—should the emphasis be on creative music-making, choral or orchestral work? John Emanuel suggested a distinction between singing ability—which could be developed but which children either had or had not—and the kind of artistic work in his school which, he maintained, anyone could do (and which did not necessarily require skill in figure drawing).

An unspoken moral hovered somewhere, fed by other strands of the day's discussion. Clearly teachers are influenced by their own childhood experiences of school, unless these have been modified by subsequent experiences.

John Emanuel had earlier shown an impressive sequence of drawings and creative writing, about stone faces in a local church, that a Hertfordshire teacher had produced on an in-service course, after insisting she had never been any good at art. Everybody, he insisted, can do it, if only they have opportunity and encouragement. But "teachers are so busy, they won't take time to feed themselves, or create for themselves".

The Lincoln course seems to recognize that. Calligraphy expert Tom Barnard has a session with each year's group, getting them practising with a pen. There is to be a "workshop" session one Saturday soon, giving course members a chance to experiment with accessible artistic techniques like batik and wax resist.

The heads appreciate the visits to schools even though many of the course's benefits are too recent, deep and inchoate to pin down. One "teaching head" told me she now appreciated the importance of displaying children's work attractively. Double-mounting is only a means to an end, but she seems to have understood that purpose: she observed that the children seemed to be making more effort over their work as a result.

The course also brings the college advantages, fostering closer links with local schools and teachers, particularly with those schools that accept college students on teaching practice. Heads are often more sympathetic to the college—and its philosophy—after the course. John Pykett had had students from the college for 17 years, but when he was on the course "I felt, for the first time, a small part of what goes on in college".

Though one head in that first year thought innocently they had been picked with a pin, course members had been carefully chosen from among those already involved in college teaching practice (and likely to appreciate the course's approach). Now entry to the course is handled by the relevant local authorities.

Len Marsh hopes that past members of the course will gradually form a nucleus, so that later courses can draw upon their experoince and visit their schools, rather than always going further afield. (One or two members have already had the group into their schools.) Many course members want to maintain their connections with the college and each other; John Pykett, two years after the course, still values the contacts he made with other heads. Perhaps eventually there will be a reunion of past members of the Lincoln course, like the annual Plowden get-together?

The new Victorians

Heather Neill visits the Young Vic where Michael Bogdanov's new company have just launched their season with a production of 'Bartholomew Fair'

Michael Bogdanov laughs a good deal. In fact, the whole of the new Young Vic company seemed to be exploding into chuckles and guffaws most of the time during a recent afternoon's rehearsal—and that with only a week to go to the first previews. ("This show will preview for four years", said someone wryly). An actor cracks a joke, someone else puns on that and the witticisms spread like a forest fire, so in tune are they with each others sense of humour. Meanwhile, serious (if hilarious) work is going on a few yards away. There is nothing hushed or reverent about Mr Bogdanov's rehearsals, but there is an underlying sense of confidence among the company members: they know that they can rely on each other and the director, and that they are all working towards the same end. This is not surprising as many of them have been together for between two and seven years already and have signed contracts to stay in the company for two years. ("If you're going to be together that long, it's got to be fun", said one actor). There is certainly no panic as the first night approaches.

All of which is just as well, for Mr Bogdanov has embraced a mammoth task. You might think that when a director takes over a theatre he merely displays a sign reading "Under new management" and prepares to feel his way into the job. You might also expect him to concentrate on an artistic blockbuster to justify his appointment. At the Young Vic it is more like the setting up of a new state. There is a new education service led by Peter Murphy (ex Cockpit TIE), there are plans to go out into schools and the local community and to throw the theatre open for a festival next month. The coffee/wine bar has been redesigned, the theatre floor replaced, new lighting installed and (really good news this) the seats are to be padded. As for making an initial impact, Michael Bogdanov is realistic. Bartholomew Fair is not going to exhaust the company. He hopes it will be good, of course, and the actors have been carefully prepared and the text minutely discussed to that end. Considerable energy has gone into acquiring circus skills like unicycling and tightrope-walking (a Bogdanov trademark: any actor has to be willing to put heart, soul, arms, legs and a head for heights into his productions). But Bartholomew Fair has to be seen as part of a long-term development, one of a number of projects. Mr Bogdanov smiles and says that things will "probably be pretty rough" for about six months, until the company consolidates its position.

Until just over a year ago Michael Bogdanov's work was little known outside Newcastle and Leicester, where he had spent most of the 10 years or so after graduating from Trinity College, Dublin. And then, "I put my head over the wall, and all this happens. It's rather frightening, really. For one thing the Metropolis is still so important . . . " Peeping over the wall took the form of touring his near-legendary production of the children's play The Magic Drum to make money for the Phoenix Theatre, Leicester. The tour ended with a few performances at the National Theatre, where the ritualistic beauty, the discipline and spell-binding power of the production (usually restless children were held in breathless concentration throughout, and for this reason Mr Bogdanov rates it most highly of all his work) led to two Christmas productions for young people at the National. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, based on the medieval poem, was a smash hit and is to be revived this year. The Hunchback of Notre Dame showed the other side of Mr Bogdanov's theatrical nature: a fascination with rough street theatre and a desire to give the audience "a time they didn't expect to have". Then came the chance to direct The Taming of the Shrew at Stratford and the directorship of the Young Vic.

Some of the Young Vic company practise their circus skills.

Michael Bogdanov is a stocky man, informal and restless, more like an energetic site foreman than the popular idea of a theatre director. He has some trenchant things to say about the theatrical establishment. The major companies are too similar in style, he says, too unadventurous, and most of the influences for change come from abroad. In this country a predominantly cerebral approach has been the theatre's downfall; he firmly advocates that the physical and intellectual should go hand in hand. "TIE was an influence and has permeated some areas of theatre, but it has sounded its own death bell by not noticing lack of quality early enough and by making a contract with education so that it has been swallowed up. Working in harness with professional theatre was its great strength." He acknowledges a spread of theatre into fringe, community and experimental groups, but says this has not had much effect at the top. "The theatre must be the voice of ordinary people for change or it is an anachronism."

Michael Bogdanov has always enjoyed working in the regions because "it is easier to focus, there are more opportunities and fewer distractions than in London". Excep at the Young Vic, where he feels he a similar freedom.

Why Bartholomew Fair for the fi duction? "I wanted something th bring all the skills of the company to begin with." This includes the two directors: Jeremy James Taylor has tion over the music and Mel Smith i the cast through their circus paces. danov does not scruple to change word or to cut where necessary i text as complicated as Jonson's to a modern audience, especially due consist mainly of young people. But not mean he feels he must concentra sively on the comedy. "There is a between the comedy and blackness. takes apart the pretentiousness of chant class mercilessly." The word que" kept coming up in rehearsal says he is taking a Brechtian view and people's place in it. Travelling theatre show

John James talks to Ian McKellen about his new travelling company

Ian McKellen's greatness as an actor was recognized early in his career. In Ipswich and Nottingham they still talk with pride of his days in the reps. His first London appearance won him the Clarence Derwent Award. From then on he starred in the West End, led the Prospect Theatre Company with national acclaim as Shakespeare's Richard II and Marlowe's Edward II, played Hamlet on a British and European tour and in London, and was a founder member of the famous Actors' Company, leading its first successful seasons. Since 1974 he has been a leading member of the RSC, scaling the great peaks of English drama as Faustus, Romeo, Leontes, Macbeth, as well as succeeding in Jonson, Ibsen, Wedekind and Shaw and picking up awards en route.

From July 13 for 15 weeks he is to lead a new company of 15 actors and 14 technicians touring parts of the country many actors never see. It is the latest development in the RSC's concern to take good classical theatre to parts of the country that are starved of it, and follows on the great success the company has had in establishing a base in Newcastle. He spoke this week about his involvement with the new, autonomous company as its artistic director.

"Our stage can go anywhere . . . It will go into a corn exchange, a school hall, a gymnasium, a church hall, an ordinary theatre even. It's specifically destined to tour; it's flexible. It's a simple trestle stage with some lighting towers around it. There's no scenery; there are costumes and actors as good as [illegible] would get at the Aldwych."

He sees the simplicity, the temporary appearance of the stage as a challenge: "I want us [illegible] to give it an air of excitement rather than of the second-rate, of 'Oh dear, this isn't the real thing'. We want it to be the real thing—the real thing depends on the play and the relationship between the audience and the actors, and I think John Napier has designed the right stage for that."

The company will present two new productions specially staged for the tour: Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, directed by Jon Amiel with music by Henry Ward, and The Three Sisters directed by Trevor Nunn. There will also be an anthology programme about the English and their Englishness, written by RSC actor Roger Rees, called Is There Honey Still For Tea?

McKellen is generous in praise of his company, pointing out their excellent records with the RSC (Patrick Godfrey, Griffith Jones, Bob Peck, Clyde Pollitt, Roger Rees), with the Actors' Company (Edward Petherbridge), Prospect (Suzanne Bertish), Glasgow Citizens' (Jeremy Blake), in the West End (Christopher Hancock, Bridget Day), with Emily Richard, television's Lorna Doone) and "that smashing actress Susan Tracey".

"This is three months of experiment. On the evidence of what happens this time we shall examine where our audience is coming from. If we find, as is likely to happen if you're within a hundred miles of London, we're getting the audience that would go to the Aldwych—that really isn't our purpose. I know that happened in Newcastle—people came up from London to see Macbeth, which wasn't fair to the people of Newcastle."

He hopes that they won't get "exclusively kids' audiences who come straight from school dinner into the theatre thinking how lucky they are to be missing double chemistry or how unlucky to be missing double games". And he is concerned, for everyone's enjoyment, that children should be prepared in advance for their visits.

"We can offer a morning when they can meet the actors, talk about the play and their approach to it, how a play is rehearsed and so on. Having done that at Newcastle and on tour with Prospect, it's my experience that if you can get kids to sit with you a couple of hours before, and see the actors as real people who are enthusiastic about the play, they begin to see it . . . not as an [illegible] text but as a play, and their view is [illegible] enough for them to enjoy it. Ideas from any school which cares to write to me in association with this tour, suggesting visits to meet actors and so on, or visits of kids to [illegible] will be very favourably received.

We will be playing to small audiences never more than 500 and often as few as [illegible] —in small halls and theatres in Scotland, the South We Pennines, East Anglia and the [illegible] visiting 23 towns and villages from Redr to Dunfermline, Frome to Milton Key Stirling to Portsmouth. With so few se to sell it's likely to be those first off the mark who get them. But there are spe concessions for young people and we're trying to keep the cost of tickets down to reasonable local level of prices. We de entirely on the Arts Council, on a sub from Hallmark Cards (the RSC's first com mercial sponsor) and the returns from box office. It's a big responsibility for we've got to be good".

In his pioneering essay "Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction", Walter Benjamin suggests that film equips us to deal with the dangers of modern life. By exposing us to shock effects, it attunes our perceptions and adjusts our reflexes to the demands of city traffic and the speed of contemporary historical change.

If true, this has instructive implications for parents and teachers. We can rest assured that the medium trains the senses and adapts the maturing organism to the environment: "Learn to cross the road by paying attention to the movies: drivers are so quick on the draw. . . . Get used to crowds on newsreels and take the rush-hour in your stride."

Picture books which use photography might be said to rely on the conditioned response of children to two technological innovations: the television documentary and the tape-recorded interview. The screen offers a familiar window on a strange world. A sequence of stills mimics cinematic presentation and may be linked by a commentary of children's voices, or a child's-eye view of what is happening; words and images synchronized in a way that makes the young feel at home.

The idea that photographs mitigate shock is relevant to Janet at School, the fourth in Black's excellent series on the lives of handicapped children. Strangers tend to be startled by evidence of physical impairment and to be gauche in their initial contacts with the disabled. The widespread reluctance to address them directly, the "does he take sugar?" syndrome, stems from a disorienting sense of practical inadequacy, the awkwardness of wanting to help and not knowing how. A visual explanation of the disability and of the ways in which it affects a particular individual prepares the reader for actual encounters and personal relationships.

"Montrice splashes away from each wave as fast as she can." One of Richard Harvey's photographs from "A Day by the Sea", by Joan Solomon (Hamish Hamilton £2.25), another story in the series about Berron, Montrice and their friends. Together with "Berron's Tooth", it will be published on June 29

It establishes a "correct compassion" by forestalling the embarrassment of dismay.

Janet has spina bifida. We see her in her wheelchair, painting in the classroom, turning the skipping-rope in the playground. Janet's pleasures—toys, pets, playmates, camping with her family—are set against her struggles—the fatigue of the walking-frame, her defencelessness against her sister's interference in her games. This is an enlightening book for any age group.

Kate's Party and Spud Comes to Play will be enjoyed by children who are learning to read and tell the time, and who have about half a dozen candles on their birthday cakes. Berron and Montrice are an attractive brother and sister of West Indian origin, who live in a multi-racial community. Sometimes it's baked beans for lunch; sometimes fish with yams. The early photographs are a little posed and self-conscious, immaculate as an advertising idyll, but the models relax during the tug of war and the turmoil of the dog with the football giving an effect of cheerful spontaneity, pleasantly described.

There's more to read in the Strands series and the appeal is to an older age-range. Mr Crossfield is a carpenter-turned-pastor who, like his wife (a secretary) and his sister-in-law (a nurse), came to England from Jamaica in 1959. The four children, aged seven, nine, 13 and 16, were all born here and give a direct account of their interests, memories and aspirations—football, athletics, cookery experiments, Sunday school trips. The experience of racial prejudice is lightly touched on. Altogether the collective self-portrait of the family is colourful and sensitive, if a trifle sedate, enlivened by the odd giggle and hint of excitement.

Of all ethnic minorities, gypsies are the hardest to see steadily and to see whole, harassed and often hated by their neighbours, idealized and sentimentalized in Art. Mary Waterson's study of the Ball family is a triumph of tact and balance, casually informative about the traditions, language and culture of travelling people—their seasonal employment, cleansing rituals and cut-glass treasures, and their strategies for maintaining family ties against all the odds. Lance Brown's black-and-white photographs capture the vitality of these travellers: the heartily house-proud Mum with her tattoos and her big smile; the alertness of the boys and their mixed feelings about school; the ambiguous expression of the father as he holds the baby who's too young to suspect what a precarious life she's been born into.

Of this illustrated batch, I liked least the "I Am" series, though I'm bound to say my reservations were not shared by the infants and juniors who sampled them. In each of the four volumes, a small child dresses up to play the part of, respectively, a fisherman, chef, ballerina and farmer. ("Is there one for a robber?" I was asked by a five-year-old. No, try the colour supplement feature on Ronald Biggs in Brazil.)

To my puritanical adult mind, this presentation of careers through make-believe photography is too literal for fantasy and too glamorous to be accurate. Anyone can see that Antonio couldn't possibly prepare those succulent dishes all by himself. And in my young day, a tiro of Natalie's tender years would scarcely presume to call herself a dancer, still less adopt a ballerina's title. But a seven-year-old pupil chose this as her favourite book because "she's real and you can tell how she does things". Chests in the reception class swelled with vicarious pride when Tom the Fisherman landed an enormous flat-fish. The text is minimal, the pictures bright.

All these glossy productions are sturdily bound to withstand repeated handling. Leila Berg's "Snaps" are much cheaper and bound in card, but still likely to get heavy wear and well worth poring over. They record the experiences of her grandchildren and their friends—exploring the park, visiting the zoo, celebrating a birthday, shopping in a market for Christmas presents. Each small episode is shaped by suspense and surprise.

The photographer, John Walmsley, is known for his Summerhill study which makes everyone who sets eyes on it eager to join the school, infected by the enthusiasm that he conveys.

The narrative is sparse but subtle. Meaning resonates in the space between words and pictures. A chance remark reveals shifting relationships. Christy needs help in blowing up his balloon and his friend thinks "He's getting a bit young for me". She chooses a much older partner in the three-legged race, realizing, as they both collapse, that in this game "you've both got to be the same size".

The pace of events may be too swift for some readers; Christian names for adults and unisex abbreviations make it difficult to be sure who's who, and the kids you can identify grow confusingly between books. For Nan, of course, this only enhances their charm, which will probably captivate all but the outraged sensibilities who have already complained of "the depths of squalor" in Leila Berg's previous work. For them, this depiction of youth will be too true to be good. Permissively-raised children have untidy homes, tatty gardens, tangled hair, rumpled clothes (and, once, in a bathroom, a bare bottom). They are wholly oblivious of the camera, passionately absorbed in what they're doing, and their disregard for appearances may come as a shock.

The caption for the boldly flaring (but fully safe-guarded) firework display reads: "It was wild, really wild." The same might be said, for good or ill, of the impact of these books.

Chaos behind closed doors

William Cleghorn on psychological warfare

War on the Mind. By Peter Watson.
Hutchinson £9.95. 09 131440 2.

The world's annual expenditure on arms and war is not known with any certainty. Some nations publish what they are pleased to call defence budgets, others don't. But the total certainly runs to hundreds of billions of pounds. It is not surprising to find a trickle of this mighty stream of finance, perhaps a modest hundred million or two a year, diverted into research intended to discover the effects of all this latent and actual violence on those who perform direct and receive it.

Peter Watson wrote War on the Mind after discovering that psychological warfare ("psywar" in the hideous jargon of its practitioners) was the subject of far more research than he had imagined when he set out in 1973, as a Sunday Times journalist, to investigate the use of psychological methods by British troops in Northern Ireland. In the course of visits to eight countries in North America, Europe and the Middle East he found 146 organizations that spend all or part of their time studying military psychology. As well as units within the armed forces, there are private research institutes, university departments, hospitals and "think-tanks" with sinister acronymic names like HumRRO (Human Resources Research Office).

They form a closed world. Their reports are more or less secret, and for this very reason, Watson's research suggests, many of them seem unaware of much that goes on in their sister institutes. So much for the psychology of collaboration between military allies. A complementary chaos behind closed doors in the Eastern bloc can be confidently predicted. Secrecy, as Watson demonstrates all too well, is the best friend of bad organization and lousy science.

The biggest military spenders do the most psychological research, of course. Watson counted no less than 130 organizations in the USA studying problems ranging from the training of marksmen and the selection of bomb disposal squads to terrorist psychology, combat fatigue, atrocities and the use of animals as spies. The results provide a few intriguing insights into the human condition, but they seem in the main to be either banal or bizarre. Military psychologists are the market researchers and the time-and-motion analysts of warfare, and much of their work is about as fascinating as a productivity study of the output of crankshafts at Fords, if you discount the gruesome analogues of production that they use: time-to-first-hit, psychiatric attrition rates and so on.

The techniques of the high street have found their way into the trenches. Interviewers, doubtless wielding clipboards and questionnaires, would buttonhole troops leaving the front in Korea to ask which of the enemy's weapons they found most frightening. They must have received some colourful answers. Other lines of investigation have produced evidence—worrying, no doubt, to their sponsors—that many men in a battle do not fight, even when themselves are under attack. Much effort has gone into finding out why. And if the supply of top-grade human beings for combat duty should dry up, what then? The psychologists have anticipated that possibility. Ready for use by the hard-pressed strategist, there are studies of the performance of mentally handicapped men ("marginal personnel") in combat skills.

At times Watson adopts the style of a combat manual: "Survival in battle will often depend on which side first sees, recognizes or accurately locates its targets." The most marginal of personnel will hardly dispute that. Nor will they doubt that "atrocities are perhaps the worst type of war crime that there is", unless they can think up some new words to describe worse ones.

Throughout this long, brightly but often loosely written book, which steers an erratic course between good journalism and indifferent scholarship, Watson's concern is to show how military psychology, having fed on the vast growth of international arsenals and the increasingly [illegible] ingenuity of each new generation of weapons technology, is now itself making war more likely through its indiscriminate exploitation of human frailty in the pursuit of military advantage.

I think he fails, though not for want of diligence in his researches. The trouble is that his story seems to defy his best intentions, suggesting that war, despite much high-flown rhetoric in Geneva conventions, United Nations resolutions and elsewhere, is as likely as ever to be conducted on principles of naked expediency, with or without the encouragement of military psychologists. Clausewitz, the great military theorist of Napoleonic times, dismissed the matter with Prussian terseness: "To introduce into the philosophy of war a principle of moderation would be an absurdity". Since those days military technology may have changed out of all recognition, but the psychology of warfare, for all its modern quasi-scientific trappings, still seems its old, eternal self.

J. R. de S. Honey on sado-masochism in England

The English Vice: Beating, Sex and Shame in Victorian England and after. By Ian Gibson.
Duckworth £12.50. 7156 1264 4.

"The English vice", said an MP during one of the early Wolfenden debates, "is not buggery but humbuggery". Neither of these applications of the term suits the author of this book, who claims it applies properly to our national obsession with flagellation. That we are a "beating-obsessed society" is due, he says, to tendencies in the upbringing of children which were at their most influential in the Victorian period and are reflected today in the persistence of corporal punishment in our schools.

Mr Gibson documents the proliferation of sado-masochistic phenomena in England from medieval times onwards, in the family, in schools, brothels, reformatories, and in the armed forces and the colonies; and above all in the development of an enormous literature of flagellant pornography which in the Victorian period even penetrated the correspondence columns and advertisements of apparently respectable family magazines and newspapers.

As a result of the inculcation of these passions at the hands of parents, governesses, prep school and public school masters, a high proportion of the rulers of Victorian Britain (claims the author) were sado-masochists: "every corner of the Empire must have had its flagellant administrators", licensed to behave "like so many public school prefects".

I approached the task of reviewing this book in a mood of resignation: the whole subject is repellent to me, as indeed to the vast majority, but I have tended to share the view, as parent, educationist, and citizen, that "six of the best" may be an uncomplicated, speedy and effective remedy, to be used as a last resort for errant schoolboys, and mandatorily for thugs and vandals. After 350 pages of Mr Gibson's admittedly strong meat, I am no longer so sure.

Though buttressed by an impressive array of sources (many of them listed by Ashbee), Mr Gibson's case is built up on fuzzy educational and social history, and contradictory (though fascinating and individually plausible) psychological theories. He is weak on the background of religious flagellation—early Fathers, monks, hermits, penitents, pilgrims, even dear St Francis who gets cited in the pornographic literature.

He fathers the public school beating rituals variously on headmasters of Eton and on Arnold of Rugby, in respect of whom he neglects Bamford's important studies. He knows nothing of the proclivities of Joseph (monitorial) Lancaster, and elementary schools are largely neglected, beyond a mention of the specific, indirect, influence of flogging stereotypes in periodicals like Gem and Magnet, aspects of a more generalized influence which Professor Halsey's Reith Lectures have recently confirmed. But his publishers, who do an extensive line in high-priced literary sexology, have given Mr Gibson a well-produced book, properly indexed and pertinently illustrated. His own howlers are few (he has, for example, the wrong Bishop of Clogher), though I would dispute his simplistic judgments on such figures as C. J. Vaughan, Oscar Browning, and George Orwell.

His tone is doctrinaire and polemical. Anti-floggers are "brilliant, eloquent, humane"—even the otherwise notoriously illiberal Maxwell Fyfe. Their critics "mouth old rubbish", and offer only "threadbare arguments", "clichés". Mr Gibson has not begun to understand why otherwise rational and apparently humane people believe that for certain kinds of wilful violence it may be particularly appropriate, quite apart from any considerations of deterrence or reform, to subject offenders to a token dose of their own medicine.

Any headmaster can provide examples of the injury to society and to the general sense of justice in the community involved in forms of treatment which are felt to be "soft". Pupils in five Surrey secondary schools who have just recommended the humiliation of a public birching for vandals are not being entirely perverse; nor are the Manx who cling to their tradition in the face of international opinion.

Two of Mr Gibson's arguments seem to deserve serious attention. I think he has established a strong potential connexion, on physiological grounds, between corporal punishment which involves the buttocks rather than the hands, and later patterns of masochism. Second, I can't see how to get round the element of degradation attaching to the official (especially juridical) administering of such punishment. Anyone who defends corporal punishment will have to attend to these objections, which make the procedure less "uncomplicated" than is generally thought. Fortunately public awareness of the general connexion between punishment and sadistic (though not always overtly sexual) impulses has drastically reduced the commonness of corporal punishments in schools in the past 50 years.

This book will bring joy to two groups of people: those readers who are subject to these perverse passions, and those, like the organization STOPP, who campaign for the abolition of all corporal punishment in schools. Its documentation will attract the first group but its logic will not really advance the cause of the second, for it is too full of contradictions and dubious speculation.

The connexion between pain and sexuality is too complex (even in working-class subcultures, an area totally ignored in this book, but ask any social worker) to fit the neat antitheses of Mr Gibson's polemic, and when you add the complications of shame, parental cruelty, etc, and throw in the problems of separating fact from fantasy in your pornographic source materials, it makes the doctrinaire simply look foolish. But for emphasizing some potential dangers, Mr Gibson can take some credit.

A time for change

B. Ruth McKnight on the probation service

Probation: A Changing Service. By David Haxby.
Constable £8.50. 09 461530 6.

Between 1950 and 1976, the probation service increased five times. During the past 10 or 15 years the nature and scope of its work has changed dramatically. Legislation and the reorganization of local authority based social work has meant that work with juveniles has been gradually phased out. Matrimonial and kindred social work is fast disappearing, and probation officers have moved firmly into work with adult offenders, in the community, in penal institutions and in the spheres of aftercare and parole. New resources such as hostels and day centres have come within the orbit of the service. New ways of working have been tried.

It is surprising therefore that, since March 1962, when the Morison Committee reported on its review of the service, there has been no comprehensive look at the work of the probation service, and no attempt except in piecemeal fashion by way of articles and reports to examine the effects these changes have made.

David Haxby's recent book Probation: A Changing Service, is therefore particularly welcome. It is a work which systematically outlines the present task of the service, incorporating the recent changes. It evaluates various experimental schemes and research projects and as such it is a useful textbook for students and practitioners alike.

If this were all, it would merit attention. However, Haxby's stated purpose in writing this book is to stimulate concern and discussion about the future of the service. He argues that the recent developments have taken place in an ad hoc way, without any ov strategy or plan. As a result, probation service is in danger becoming isolated from the m stream of social work as a m service of the courts. His al tive to this is a well-argued for a wholly new approach.

He recommends the setting of local community corre boards. Within this new struc the probation service would only be responsible for its cri functions, but would become "specialized service for de within the community with offe and their families". This service would see its role preventive, it would enlis support of volunteers and community as a whole and it w initiate research. Officers would encouraged to diversify method of client contact and wo have a wider range of resour their disposal.

These are no vague propo Haxby spells them out in de and outlines the administr structure necessary to achie change.

Much of his thinking and ar ments are not new. However does challenge a formidable of opinion in the service wh reasons that to develop in this probation must abandon tha of its existing work not relati offenders, namely matrimonial and the work which is at pres expanding at the fastest divorce court work. In addit number of vested interests w affected by the proposed adm trative changes.

Puzzling

Over the years we have reviewed, and praised highly, a number of Martin Gardner's collections involving recreational mathematics. It is good to note now a reprint of a first-class book, Mathematical Puzzles and Diversions (Penguin, 75p), representative of the best of his work. Number games, hex, fallacies, polyominoes and topology are among the features.

Work and play

If you are reading this review the chances are that you are in a favoured work position. And you might be tempted to think that a study of the psychological well-being associated with work is bound to be academic and pretentious. Peter Warr and Toby Wall's Work and Well-being (Penguin £1.25) may be academic, but pretentious it certainly is not.

The book concentrates on the jobs of lower-level employees in all sorts of organizations. By drawing on a wide range of research evidence, mainly, though not exclusively, from applied psychology, it demonstrates not only that the psychological well-being of its workers raises important questions for a society but also that there is benefit to be gained from addressing them. It is important to realize that the authors are not talking about the much discussed "job satisfaction" but about a far wider concept of well-being which many jobs impair.

The bulk of the book consists of an analysis of four major aspects of work that bear on well-being. This is preceded by a brief historical account of theoretical influences on research into job attitudes: Taylor's scientific management; the emphasis on social factors arising out of the Hawthorne studies; Maslow's concept of self-actualization; and Herzberg's two-factor theory with its qualitative distinction between job satisfaction and job dissatisfaction.

Arising out of these, the four aspects of work discussed are pay, social interaction, participation in decision-making, and job designing. For each of them the relevant research evidence is assembled, and an account that possesses both theoretical and practical interest is given.

When we re not working we spend a great deal of our time engaged in leisure activities. Not only do we spend more time at them these days but we seek them out more consciously. R. and R. N. Rapoports' book Leisure and the Family Life Cycle (Routledge and Kegan Paul £3.50) examines a wide range of issues bearing on the structure and use of leisure time in the context of family life. The underlying theme seems to be the search for meaning that informs our leisure as well as our other activities. When we play with our children or support Arsenal or "read" Playboy, we do so as individuals with preoccupations and interests and (hopefully) a coherent view of ourselves and our world.

Leisure and the Family Life Cycle seeks to illuminate these issues at the different stages in people's lives, from adolescence through to retirement. The implications for the formal provision of leisure are also spelled out for each stage.

Seamus Hegarty

The paperback edition of Bill Jordan's Freedom and the Welfare State (Routledge and Kegan Paul, £2.25) is greatly to be welcomed. The author has made a thoughtful and searching contribution to the debate on the welfare state: its intrusion on freedom, the ethics of service and social control—and much else. He argues that "a necessary element in the success of any future policy will be the ability of governments to translate their intentions into a clearly stated social philosophy, which will be comprehensible to all sectors of the population". Therein lies the challenge—not so much to governments as to those of us who have to practise what governments preach.

Something rich and strange

Julian Brotherton

Living with a Stranger. By John Stewart Collis.
Macdonald and Jane's £6.50. 354 04281 5.

This is a beautifully produced book, and it is excellent news that Mr Collis is still offering us his unique tonic, a rare alloy of science and art, this time inspired by the human body. A new binocular vision is developed for us of our internal "ecology", the harmony of strange systems, some far below consciousness.

Perhaps more like an art-form than packets of information about physiology, these "discourses" are really both, but they are so far from any sort of popularization, and so far from a textbook, that they are hard to pin down. The book is a plea for the importance of the observer in illuminating the observed, which accords with recent scientific trends. It is no accident, perhaps, that the sections on the senses are the triumph of the book.

Mr Collis disclaims expert knowledge and there is no difficulty in understanding what he writes, given a very general acquaintance with biology. Among the many quotations and anecdotes, obviously chosen by a truly civilised mind, from immense reading, there are many vivid and surprising comments about living: the author must be one of our foremost lateral thinkers.

As it is living with "The Stranger" that Mr Collis is considering, and not merely the functioning of this remarkable companion of ours, the subject is expanded considerably past its usual boundaries. What really distinguishes us from the animals? Our consciousness is more than mere intelligence and quite distinct from whatever glimmerings there may be in the minds of beasts.

The author takes an explicitly "poetic", rather than either a scientific or a religious view of phenomena and their evolution. He speaks boldly in such terms as Life's Purpose and Creative Evolution. He is optimistic, humanistic, but by no means always tolerant. Some of his social criticism is controversial. The vigorous language is often lyrical, sometimes harsh, almost crackling. The book is a feast of insights and is thus educational in the truest sense: the unfettered vision of an adult mind which has not lost the intuitive profundity of the child.

Jonathan Cape £2.50. 224 01568 0.

Animals are always popular with the very young; but they are no automatic guarantee of success in a children's book. Weaving a story round an animal is not just a matter of making a boy or girl into, say, a dog or monkey. An animal character has to be a clever blend of animal and human characteristics.

Niki Daly's animals in The Girl Who Lived Down the Road are all beautifully characterized as people, but their characterization draws a lot from the animals they are. The result is a set of endearing creatures which make the most of a child's love of animals. The basic situation is not novel—a trip to the seaside—but there is a mysterious ingredient: an enigmatic little girl who tags along behind the assorted collection of pigs, dogs and one crocodile. The little girl holds the attention throughout as does Mr Daly's sureness of touch both in his illustrations and writing.

By contrast the trouble with Ben Shecter's rhinocerous and hippopotamus in The Hiding Game is that we are never made sufficiently aware of their rhinocerousness and hippopotamusness. Moreover, they look so alike that it is easy to forget which is which. It is true that they live in the jungle and meet other jungle creatures in their game of hide-and-seek, but they could just as well be tigers or two children. And even as their surroundings are a bit odd, as, for instance, when Pierre Hippopotamus walks out of the jungle into what looks like a European village.

In Tusk, Tusk David McKee makes little attempt to characterize his elephants; they are symbols, but it does not matter. In this simple moral tale, a first lesson in tolerance, we are told how once the black elephants hated all the white elephants. They fought each other to the death leaving the world apparently unpopulated until the peace-loving elephants, who had fled into the forest, emerged to a happier existence. However, "recently the little ears and big ears have been giving each other strange looks". The illustrations are exceptionally ingenious: trunks become guns, revolvers and hands to point an accusing finger. The colours are especially lovely—reminiscent of candy floss, sherbert and Brighton rock: a paradise lost or found depending on your age.

Otto the Bear is beautifully illustrated by its author and illustrator, Ivan Gantschev. Again it is a very simple moral tale. Otto makes friends with an old forester who retires to the town. The young forester and his family who take his place aren't so sympathetic to animals and Otto is out in the cold, until he has the opportunity to save the forester's life and change his views on animals in general and Otto in particular.

The paintings which accompany the story are reminiscent of East European painters like Chagall. But unfortunately, while the story demands that the child sympathises and relates to Otto, the illustrations, with their emphasis on form rather than character, distance the reader from him.

Ralph Steadman, who is better known for his biting political cartoons, is also the illustrator of Emergency Mouse, a story by Bernard Stone about a boy in hospital, worried about his pet white mouse at home, who dreams of a miniature hospital of mice under the beds in his ward.

Though Steadman has diluted the acid in his pen for his younger audience, the drawings have a rather gloomy nightmarish quality, while the story suggests a happier event altogether. However, the originality and vigour of the illustrations are not in dispute, and it is these qualities which will almost certainly make themselves felt with children.

It's a Dog's Life was written by Mark Stern when he was 15 and is about Patch who dreams up Choc Joys, takes the idea to Bulldog Food Ltd, and is mercilessly exploited. He finally settles for "a quiet, happy life in the country" with the "shy, loving and faithful Honey". The story is a bit overdetailed in its description of Bulldog Major's ostentatious and exploitive lifestyle and his treatment of Patch, and a little short on characterization; but the illustrations have a strange, faintly surreal quality, which speaks of an unusual talent.

Anne Dalton's drawings in "Tournaments" (Kestrel £2.95) display her close attention to the medieval originals which she describes in a note. This attractive book for junior and middle schools, with its clear text by Richard Barber, describes the development of tournaments over 500 years and looks at one fifteenth century one in detail.

Votes for all

Parliament. By Douglas Liversidge.
Franklin Watts £2.50. 85166 675 2.

Parliament covers the growth of English representative government in the widest sense, from the history of the Parliament buildings at Westminster to the evolution of the constitution. The latter is analysed step by step. Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights are shown as the twin bastions of the great parliamentary edifice and each significant advance is emphasized with an italicised sentence in the text. With the positioning of the last block—votes for women—building comes to a halt.

This is a clear if rather Whiggish approach, and its corollary is history of the old school: Edward II was a pervert; Spencer Perceval's assassin was a lunatic; Star Chamber's use of equity to supplement the Common Law under Henry VII was ruthless and despotic; Thomas Cromwell's role as architect of Parliament and the administration is quite ignored.

It would be optimistic to expect much reference to any economic factors behind the growth of Parliament in this context, for instance the contribution of inflation to the increasing frequency of sixteenth-century parliaments as the value of subsidies progressively diminished; and so it proves. However, despite the historical omissions, this is a useful survey, and the Whiggery does have its own felicity, in providing an antidote to the sentimental Royalism which elsewhere pervades school textbooks.

Poets of the past

Rachel Blake

Authors in their Age
Chaucer. By Gillian Evans. £2.20.
Milton. By Esmor Jones. £1.95
Blackie

The shadowy personality of Chaucer puts the writer on the man and his period at an immediate disadvantage. Gillian Evans's study lacks the sharp focal point of the person, and fails to find it in the works.

As a result bits of the book tend to read like potted Trevelyan social history and potted Tillyard on the medieval universe. It was hard to resist the thought that Chaucer's creations themselves are the great illustrators, and that had the author made more use of the originals in this role the result would have been a decidedly more lively book.

However, she covers the ground thoroughly, with sections on the literary scene of the time, languages and influences, and a sane final chapter on evaluations and versions of Chaucer up to the present day. Like all this series it is illustrated with numerous reproductions of contemporary paintings and documents, and there are some good stories of the age, such as that of the bees which were said to have constructed a chapel and altar for the host that the woman had brought back from church on her tongue and placed in the hive.

Milton has almost identical chapter headings and is clearly focused throughout, opening with a consideration of the character of the poet as revealed by the 1669 Faithorne portrait. The meeting-points of Milton's personality with the historical events of his time, with Puritanism, and the connexion between the tenor of the age and Puritanism are shown and vividly documented.

The influence of classical and Baroque art on Milton (particularly in relation to his visit to Italy and probable meeting with Bernini) is especially enlightening. We are given the suggestion that the effect of surprise and revelation of power that was intended in Bernini's design of the piazza in front of St Peter's may have been the source of the similar revelation of the earth to Satan in Paradise Lost III 542-51; and the comparison of Bernini's metamorphosis of Diana into an olive tree with Satan's, after the Fall, into a grovelling serpent.

The book is clearly understandable to students approaching Milton as a new field of study, but does not oversimplify complexities; and is capable of touching off literary excitement.

Secrets of the Tower

Jessica Saraga

Children of the Tower. By Julia Dobson.
Heinemann £2.90. 434 93459 3.

Children of the Tower has so many popular ingredients that it should amount to a recipe for success. There are the Crown Jewels, the Mint and a wild animal menagerie, not to speak of a variety of methods of murder, torture and execution. The dramatis personae include, besides a string of kings and queens, such old favourites as Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Thomas More and the Duke of Wellington.

The book is a collection of stories and incidents in the history of the Tower of London, bound together by the theme of childhood. But this is sometimes interpreted rather loosely: Elizabeth Tudor, for instance, was 21 when she was confined in the Tower by her half-sister Mary, and Margaret Roper, when her father, Sir Thomas More, was first imprisoned in the Tower, was almost 30. Otherwise the theme is a good one, providing both a linking thread and a criterion for selection.

Some of the children are royal, such as the two 14-year-olds, Henry III's queen, Eleanor of Provence, brought to live in the Tower during a period of radical rebuilding in the early thirteenth century, and Richard II, who took temporary refuge there before his confrontation with the leaders of the Peasants' Revolt. Other children are the less famous sons and daughters of Lieutenants and Constables of the Tower, a keeper of the Crown Jewels and a Porter of the Mint.

In a foreword the present Resident Governor of the Tower assures us that all Julia Dobson's facts are historically accurate. He is probably right, although the history is necessarily highly selective and the author tends to stick to a traditional line: she admits for example that the Tudor version of the murder of the Princes in the Tower by Richard III does not stand up to historical scrutiny only after following that version in her account. She also adopts what is apparently a widely accepted convention among writers of children's history in the lengthy recounting of people's thoughts, for which there can rarely be any good evidence.

However, her style is clear, her characters vividly portrayed, and the book is admirably planned and illustrated.

Role-play

Ken Robinson

Games and Simulations in Action. By Alec Davison and Peter Gordon.
Woburn Press £8.95 7130 0150 X £5.95 4002 5.

The past 10 years have seen a growing interest in role-play, gaming and simulation, not just in schools but in many areas of professional training. The literature of these techniques has also grown rapidly: one source book lists over 400 references for further reading.

Alec Davison and Peter Gordon have, however, produced a lucid, concise and practical guide to the uses and functions of these techniques in schools and elsewhere, together with a valuable guide to other sources of material and information. Through descriptions of gaming and simulation projects in action, they analyse characteristic features and relate them to the general value of what they call "enactive processes" of learning. A key function of these processes is to help children understand the basic structures of knowledge and social organization, through practical role-play and decision-making, and to reach a personal evaluation of the moral and political issues which may be raised.

Two basic premises are that games are natural manifestations of rule-governed behaviour and that there is no structure which once discovered cannot be represented by a model of some kind which shows "its mode of being". These premises are explored through practical examples directed at teachers in primary and secondary schools and in all areas of the curriculum. Detailed practical guidance is offered on the process of devising new simulations to meet specific requirements and on adapting existing models.

Drawing on the extensive experience of the Cockpit Arts Workshop in London, eight examples are detailed in a way which makes them available for almost immediate use. The use of these techniques in teaching mathematics is also discussed, together with a critical appraisal of the general problems of evaluation. The sources of almost a hundred further games and simulations are listed under subject headings with the names of major organizations and journals and a useful, if brief, bibliography. The book is well produced in A4 size for easy use, in the classroom and in preparing materials.

The authors emphasize the limited value of simulation and gaming in the absence of adequate time for talk, interaction and evaluation by the participants. These techniques are available for all teachers: whether or not they use them is a matter of personal judgment, of course. This book provides a clear and comprehensive basis on which that judgment can be made.

CAROLYN O'GRADY looks at the implications for schools of the recent report on playground safety

Concrete alternatives

A committee representing most of the organizations concerned with play and safety in this country has published a report, Danger on the Playground, which could have a dramatic effect on the design of playgrounds and play equipment. Much of it is devoted to private playgrounds and those on housing estates and in parks, but it is also, as the committee made clear, aimed at schools.

Two recommendations in particular affect schools. They are the proposal that climbing frames should never exceed 2.5 metres (roughly 7½ feet) and the suggestion that concrete surfaces should be eliminated beneath playground equipment. The report also suggests that climbing frames should be better maintained.

Whatever one thinks of their potential for imaginative play, and most experts don't think much of them at all, climbing frames are the equipment most likely to be found in a school playground. At present these frames are often as high as 10 feet, are usually built over concrete, and too often are badly maintained and installed.

A horrifying picture of a climbing frame with loose nails and unplugged open-ended metal tubes is published in Danger on the Playground. They are certainly not all as bad as this, but the committee calls for much more vigilance.

"The basic design must take account of sharp projections, tube rims, etc. Bolts and screws in all positions must be countersunk or dome-headed and secured by spring devices, etc. against loosening under vibration. Nuts must be recessed and the projecting thread cut off and smoothed or ideally covered over securely. Open-ended metal tubes must be permanently and securely plugged and sealed. Joints and connexions should be ventilated and self-draining. Where more than one metal is used, special precautions may be necessary to prevent bimetallic corrosion."

The height of 2.5 metres is based on the height at which concussion is caused when falling on earth or similar material, but certainly not concrete. It is thought likely to be the height adopted in a new British Standard on permanently installed outdoor play equipment, which is promised for publication by the end of 1978.

It is an odd fact that whereas in gymnasiums rubber or hair matting is usually placed under climbing frames or wall bars, in playgrounds these structures are almost always built on concrete. The committee which produced Danger on the Playground feel particularly strongly about the lethal nature of concrete.

"Concrete is popular because the maintenance costs are negligible. Something has gone badly wrong with our priorities since a child's skull can be fractured by a fall on to concrete from standing height let alone from a height of two metres or more at the top of a slide or climbing frame".

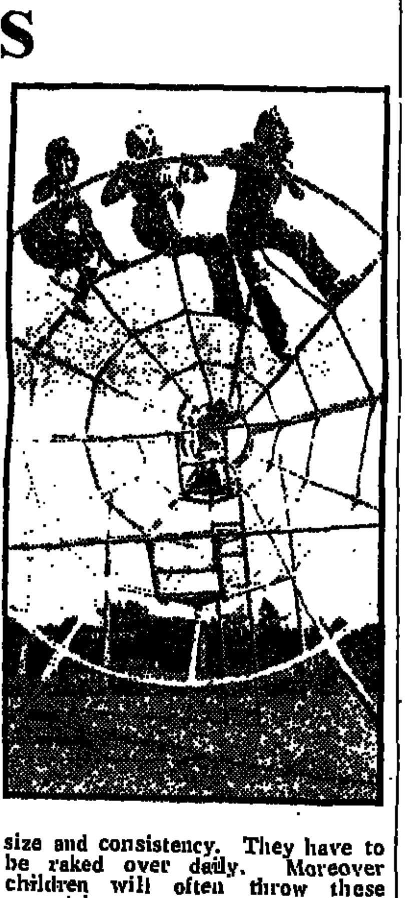
The committee urges the DES to circulate warnings about the dangers of playgrounds "with particular emphasis on the importance of eliminating concrete surfaces beneath playground equipment".

Unfortunately, all surfaces now available have disadvantages, though most are significant improvements on concrete, asphalt or coated macadam. One of the report's recommendations therefore is for Government resources to be allocated to a medical and technological research programme to identify the ideal surfacing for play areas.

Probably the most effective surface so far in use is rubber tiling. This is new and insufficient independent information is available on its durability and weather and vandal resistance. It also has one great disadvantage: it is expensive, costing between £13 and £19.60 a square metre. Rubber tiling, however, is at present considered the best surface for unsupervised areas and experts emphasise that it isn't expected that a whole playground would be resurfaced. The potential for serious injury would probably be dramatically decreased if rubber tiles were just fixed under climbing frames and high slides.

Among other alternatives, grass, apparently such a good idea, becomes muddy and slippery in wet weather. Good drainage and regular mowing is essential. Wear can also be improved by adding a layer of rot-proof plastic netting below the surface. Synthetic grass substitutes have been tried, but have been known to cause friction burns.

Loose surfaces, such as wood chips, pea gravel and sand, are remarkably shock absorbent and cheap, but require extensive maintenance: to be effective they have to be the correct depth and the ingredients just the right size and consistency. They have to be raked over daily. Moreover children will often throw these materials around or use them as play materials. Glass or sharp objects are easily concealed in them.



Pea gravel is considered to be one of the best surfaces, but it can only be used in supervised areas and must be maintained.

A school which wants to make its play equipment safer is therefore faced with a dilemma. However, they should reflect that in a survey in the Sheffied area over an 18 month period in 1974 to 1975, the climbing frame accounted for 54 accidents, coming second to the swing which accounted for 61. Nine children were admitted to hospital; 14 had fractures and six concussion or fracture of the skull.

It is also perhaps well to consider that neither the National Playing Fields Association or Design Council believe the climbing frame to be a very good piece of equipment in terms of the pleasure it gives. More imaginative playground equipment usually gives more pleasure and is often safer.

The National Playing Fields Association publish a number of leaflets and books on playgrounds and surfaces. The address is 25 Ovington Sq, London SW3.

Playing safe

"We want to encourage play not discourage it." This statement, made by Miss Sue Kearsley, coordinator of Fair Play for Children, at the House of Commons press conference held to launch the report, Danger on the Playground, has been overlooked in the publicity surrounding the report.

As well as urging a ban on certain types of manufactured equipment, the committee would like to see a proliferation of more imaginative schemes in schools and and other playgrounds. It points out that less imaginative equipment is often dangerous. Available statistics suggest, for example, that few accidents happen in adventure playgrounds, which look so dangerous, and that these are the playgrounds apparently most enjoyed by children. This is partly because these playgrounds are always supervised (the committee is calling for the mandatory supervision of all playgrounds by trained personnel). Adventure playgrounds also seem to make children more aware of danger, says Miss Kearsley.

The most successful playgrounds, the committee agrees, are often those which parents, children and teachers, with expert advice, have built themselves. Unfortunately this is rare and often people design playgrounds who have no idea of the needs or inclinations of children. Paul Burral of the Design Council gives as an example the architect-designed slide, built on the edge of a "precipice", a picture of which was sent to the Design Council in anticipation of an award. It completely ignored the fact that children do not always use equipment in the way intended.

Often imaginative playgrounds are put together at very little cost: an extraordinarily successful ingredient, for example, has been old car tyres which can be obtained from a sympathetic garage and which have been used to make climbing structures and as a safe substitute for swing seats (though in this case they must be replaced every so often).

However, the committee certainly does not rule out manufactured equipment and the Design Council has a section, though small, on playground equipment. Its address is the Design Council, 28 Haymarket, SW1.

Information on the design and building of playgrounds can be obtained from the National Playing Fields Association and Community Service Volunteers hopes to publish a pack on this subject in the near future. Its address is: 237 Pentonville Road, N1.

Discovering France. Paris
By Ian Ferguson and Don Grear
Macmillan Education, Houndmills, Basingstoke RG21 2XS. Price, £8

Discovering France is a series of four information packs covering different regions. The titles are Provence, Brittany, Aquitaine and Paris. The series is said to be intended for the lower and middle years of secondary school, where pupils are involved in area studies or CSE and O level. Each pack contains a full-colour wallchart, five topic sheets (eight copies of each), a book of spirit duplicator masters with pupil questions and a teacher's book. All the information and questions are in English.

The starting-point is the wallchart, which is large enough to be seen from a distance and features a map of Paris showing various monuments. Pupils answer questions on the work sheets. The teacher's book gives a resume of topic sheets and questions and gives suggestions for use. There is no shortage of advice but some may be impractical for the hard-worked teacher.

The "Story of Paris" worksheet gives two pages of questions, some short and factual, some with multiple-choice answers, others "Questions to Explore". These last demand a more detailed approach to Gothic architecture, French cars and the age of the Celts. Suggestions such as writing a summary of the story of the Hunchback of Notre Dame take a lot of time and are only peripherally related to the topic sheet.

Another topic sheet, "The People of Paris", gives a breakdown of the types of people living in certain arrondissements, generalizing about how the Parisian shops, eats, frequents cafes and leaves the city to the tourist in August. The work sheet has the same question format and points out differences between Britain and France. "What to see in Paris", "What's on in Paris" and "Getting about in Paris" are designed to encourage young people to visit the capital and see as much as they can. The worksheets for these three topics provide a multitude of questions and project suggestions substantiating the authors' claim that "Discovering France—Paris" could provide enough work for one period a week for a term.

On the debit side, the section of the worksheets specifically geared to "Discovering France" is too repetitive. The authors seem to have concentrated almost exclusively on question and answer work, ignoring the many possibilities for involving children in more imaginative and varied activities. The claim that the pack could be used for CSE and O level language studies needs careful scrutiny. Few examination classes could afford to devote a term to studying material without a word of French. This pack would be most suitable in studies for non-linguists.

Good vibrations for younger singers

Children who are unable to sing in tune may now be helped by a technique developed at the University of Liverpool. It uses bone conduction to allow them to hear musical tones through the forehead as well as the ear.

The system has been developed by Dr Emlyn Roberts and Dr Jon Baggaley of the Centre for Communication Studies. A small vibrator is placed against the child's forehead and a sound signal is played through it for the child to repeat vocally. "The vibration around the child's cranium reinforces the tonal sensation that is received through the ears", says Dr Roberts. "Even children with the most pronounced inability to sing in tune gain in accuracy and confidence when the technique is employed with them".

The investigators prefer to avoid using the term "tone-deafness" to describe this condition. They point out that if a child cannot reproduce musical sounds, it does not mean that he or she cannot hear them. Quite often children are simply unable to coordinate the mechanism involved in articulating the sound, and they can experience intense frustration in the attempt.

"Children who cannot sing in tune when they are young are often self-conscious because they think they will never be able to sing correctly like their class-mates", says Dr Roberts. "Music teachers also tend to ignore them, assuming that nothing can be done."

The work in music education is one of the centre's activities. They also examine communication processes from psychological, linguistic and sociological viewpoints. Dr Baggaley says that "the imperfect-pitch-singing work is a very practical example of the contribution a department like this can make. Its results are particularly promising for speech pathology".

By allowing people with impaired speech to concentrate more fully on the musical components of speech sounds, the investigators hope that the bone conduction treatment may gain ground in the treatment of stammering and slurred speech suffered by post-stroke patients.

Competitive cameras

The Royal Photographic Society's third Audio-Visual Festival is planned for November 24 to 26. The festival is a competition of slide-sound sequences and attracts entries from photographers of many nationalities. There are categories for juniors, under 15 years, and students, under 21. The RPS say that the junior category produces some excellent work.

Further information can be obtained from RPS Audio Visual Festival, Royal Photographic Society, 14 South Audley Street, London W1Y 5DP.

Practical puppetry for the handicapped

The Puppet Centre is to run a five-day course on "How to Run a Puppet Therapy Workshop", from August 1 to 5. It is intended for teachers in special schools or for anyone interested in puppetry used for therapy, and will include practical work with handicapped children. The sessions will run from 10.30 am to 5 pm and the fee for the course is £16.

Enrolment forms can be obtained from The Puppet Centre, Battersea Arts Centre, Lavender Hill, London SW11 5TJ.

Calories in colour

A poster which shows portions of food and gives their calorie counts has been produced by Slimming magazine. As well as those illustrated there is information on 100 more foods, and suggestions for slimmers. These include a mention of Slimming magazine's own weight watching club and notes on cookery, calorie requirements, pills, slimming machines and weight fluctuations. The poster is in colour and costs 40p a copy, or 35p a copy if 50 or more are ordered.

Enquiries to Slimming Magazine, 4 Clareville Grove, London SW7 5AR.

Energy consumption

Utility Newsbriefs is a quarterly review of energy and telecommunications, mainly concerned with cost and tariffs. The issue for May has items on the Plowden Committee's proposals for restructuring the electricity industry, and on the effects of Fuel Cost Adjustment (FCA) on different types of consumer. Utility Newsbriefs could be useful in studies of energy topics and they are available free.

Finding the sources

Terence Brake

What sort of information do children need when they leave school? What information sources are able to supply the relevant information? What information-handling skills should children acquire before leaving in order fully to utilize such sources?

These three questions underpin "The Need to Know" project which is being researched at this school. Funded for one year by the British Library, it is aimed to help children (principally fourth year) learn both the importance and use of community information in the management of everyday problems.

Since at least the Second World War profound institutional changes have taken place in information provision. Citizens' advice bureaux, consumer advice centres, law centres along with public libraries have, or are rapidly becoming, established landmarks in the High Street "information scenery".

Many more informal sources have also appeared since the 1960s. This institutional innovation is, of course, part of a significant value change, in which information has come to be seen as a source of both corporate and personal power.

One possible drawback is that the creation of so many sources itself creates an information/communication problem not only between the sources, but between the sources and individuals and groups.

In such a world, the relationship between education and information is crucial. However, the aim is not simply to provide an information service in the school but to offer the pupils a chance to exercise those information skills necessary for independent "finding out" and self-determination.

Library skills are taught from the first year, and the project is an attempt at extending the skills of searching for and evaluating information into the wider community.

The project tasks are basically three: to collect details of as many alternative information sources as possible within the catchment area (Hackney and Tower Hamlets); to organize this material into retrievable form, bearing in mind that the file is to be used by the pupils and maintained by untrained personnel; and to develop a teaching programme.

After discussions with fifth year classes, it was decided to focus a 10-week experimental programme on the topic of "leisure", bringing in other areas of information priority—money, transport, health, housing—as they became relevant. Three questions are guiding the initial formulation of the programme:

What do I need to know? Teaching tasks to develop skills of problem formulation and need identification (self reflection), and an information perspective in relation to the management of "problems".

Where do I find it? Teaching tasks to inform the pupils of the type and functions of community information sources in Hackney and Tower Hamlets, and to encourage and develop the use of information skills necessary to utilize these sources.

What does it mean? Teaching tasks to develop perceptions of relevance, adequacy and critical understanding of information.

One danger is that "information" may appear to be presented as a panacea. That obstructions exist against which even the possession of relevant information is powerless must therefore be an important element in the course.

The information technologists, through Viewdata, Teletex, Ceefax and Oracle, are well on the way to providing living rooms with the near equivalent of Batman and Boy Wonders' breath-taking bat-computer. However, until the time when information skill can be reduced to switching on a television set (a skill few children need to be taught), greater attention needs to be given to the education—information dimension, and the priority it should command in a curriculum.

Terence Brake is research officer at South Hackney School, London.

Infant art

Sally Wells

An infant classroom in any town. Group 1 has just completed a collage with Miss Jones. The collage is for the class project "Eskimos and their homes".

As Miss Jones does not think their drawing is very good she has drawn around one child, and the children have filled in the outline with coloured tissue paper. Not everyone is allowed to do a picture. Nigel, for example, is "not very good at drawing".

He often chooses the "wrong" colour for his picture making, and you cannot always tell what it is meant to be. Soon it will be parents' day—they want to see a nice display. . . .

What is being learnt here? What are the aims and immediate objectives of the teacher? Is the topic within the repertoire of experience of a five-year-old urban dweller?

Consider some of the assumptions made by Miss Jones. As the class is "not very good" at drawing she has drawn the outline. Therefore Miss Jones presumes to have the necessary skills which the pupils do not possess.

This is superficially valid, since a reversal would render the teacher obsolete. However, realism (or at least an approximate symbol which is instantly recognizable by another adult) was required predominantly for the benefit of the parents.

I would like to make some points about the above imaginary scene.

The infant teacher is expected to be an all-rounder while having, in most cases, specialized in the teaching of only one subject. Pressure is on her to produce a "good" display, and when she sees the competent standard of those around her, she often feels a temptation to aid the children with their own frequently "messy" and apparently inept attempts.

Setting unrealistic standards may cause children to learn a sense of their own inadequacy rather than how to draw. All teachers recognize the developmental stages in relation to the teaching of maths, but some fail to appreciate the sequential development of children's art.

Some infant teachers admit that they are "unable to draw", and yet do not hesitate to draw for children. One wonders if they prevent those whose grasp of mathematical concepts is tenuous from doing maths?

Children who are consistently "not allowed" to be involved in art because of "poor results" may be permanently damaged in this sphere of communication, because their self-concept may eventually inhibit any attempt.

Art teaching, at infant level, should not be concerned with therapeutic remediation, but accorded the same status as maths or English, thus requiring the same effort and quiet atmosphere as any other intellectual activity. To relegate art teaching to merely providing "a less boring wallpaper" or "to brighten up the corridor for the parents" is to negate its entire function.

The analysis of a given problem, formulation of a solution and synthesis into a visual "language" to convey the solution is what children are involved in, at this early stage, until they are able to formulate their own problems.

Young children should be encouraged to use a multi-disciplinary approach (including art-based visual solutions) to certain problems which have been, traditionally, compartmentalised along certain mathematical or other "intellectual" channels.

A child's painting is its organization of two-dimensional surface and not the object itself. Therefore, that choice of colour is valid, in that it represents their response to the stimulus of the object or experience.

How a child uses the space provided may indicate that maturity and development, but the cropping of the painting by the teacher may cause the infant bewilderment at the teacher's apparent lack of concern for the work. Areas of the picture which appear to an adult to be redundant, by virtue of their lack of line or colour, may be relevant to the spatial organization of the child.

The concepts of neatness, keeping the paint within the boundaries and no blotches may indicate a well-coordinated hand and eye and manual dexterity, but they are adult concepts which have little to do with the intentions of the child.

Sally Wells is a former infant teacher.

TALKBACK

The alternative road

Philip Coggin

More than thirty teachers from almost as many different schools have visited our City and Guilds foundation course, now in its fourth year. Their views on the need for such a course, and their observations after seeing it in action, revealed a remarkable unanimity.

Like us, they found that a one-year sixth form course based on O level, CSE, RSA, and general studies amounted to no more than a ragbag of bits and pieces, with at most a 50 per cent success rate. Like us, they found our students highly motivated.

Our courses have concentrated on engineering, commerce, and community care. We have found five main advantages. The course is a package deal. It works out at about two days of general education, two days of vocational education, and one day of non-examined but compulsory cultural and recreational activities a week. Students have a full timetable. In the past it was often difficult to keep them occupied throughout the week.

The vocational orientation of the course creates high motivation. They see the point of what they are studying.

It is economical on staffing. The whole group, which has ranged between 26 and 48, can be taken together or in suitable units for the general education and the cultural and recreational activities. This enables us to give more liberal staffing to the vocational elements. We also find it an advantage to combine them for some periods with the A level general studies course.

The course provides for a wide range of ability. Every non-A level student must follow the City and Guilds course. Thus, those who want to gain one or more O levels to complete a particular four or five O level qualification are fully occupied, and have the City and Guilds Certificate as an insurance policy should they fail to achieve O level.

The City and Guilds' insistence that the pass level should be within reach of the average pupil makes the certificate a realistic aim for all who are likely to stay on. Distinction and credit grades provide higher aims for the brighter students.

It has not been easy for teachers trained in the academic tradition to adapt to this new approach. In each year there has been an improvement, but we still have much to learn.

We have faced criticism from employers, who charge us with encouraging these pupils to stay on when they should be starting work. They argue that at 17 they are too old for apprenticeships. Yet most of the students return because they have failed to find jobs or apprenticeships at 16.

Some return because they have come to their senses after wasting time in the fifth form. But the proof of the pudding is in the eating. They do get good jobs, they do secure apprenticeships, and some continue in full-time further education.

One setback this year was the 50 per cent drop in numbers. This also happened in most other Swindon schools. Strong propaganda to ensure that school leavers know their Social Security rights persuaded many parents that the dole was preferable to education.

Job creation schemes have also taken their toll. Three engineering students, however, who turned down offers of £19 a week on the Engineering Industry Training Board's 48-week course, did so on the grounds that it would tie them to engineering, while the foundation course would allow them to keep their options open. That, perhaps, is the best answer to those who say that the City and Guilds is too vocational for a school curriculum.

The effectiveness of this course must call into question the suitability of CSE for average pupils in the main school. Should we not perhaps be discussing the 14 to 19 rather than the 16 to 19 age group?

Philip Coggin is head of Park Senior High School, Swindon.

The Times Euromarkets
and Foreign Bond Quarterly

First issue on subscription out in July.

This quarterly publication covers international bonds, foreign bonds and medium term credits in considerable depth.

It will prove an invaluable source of reference and a useful means to plot trends for all bankers, institutional investors, analysts, large private clients, UNIVERSITIES and BUSINESS SCHOOLS.

Each main section has a commentary by one of The Times experts, lists of new issues, followed by tables and pictorial charts.

They show currency of life, type of borrower, geographical and industrial breakdowns, sinking fund diary and liquidity statistics.

Of course, there'll always be items cropping up in each section which will merit special coverage. The publication is rounded off with a supplement of tombstone advertisements.

An annual subscription is only £80 in the U.K., £85 in Europe and £90 elsewhere. The first issue available to subscribers, covering April to June, 1978, will be mailed in July.

Headmaster: Peter Dawson, B.Sc. (Econ.)
Required:
Teacher for our Social Education Department which serves the needs of Fourth and Fifth Year pupils whose abilities do not equip them to follow a traditional examination course. The department has its own wing of the school, its own team of teachers and its own curriculum. Community services, work experience and college link courses are ingredients of a programme which also gives close attention to basic skills. Examination opportunities are based on a number of C.S.E. Mode 3 courses. The department has a large share of the school's resources and is under the leadership of a Senior Teacher. Its achievements over a period of seven years have led many to reconsider their previous prejudices regarding what standards may be reached by 'unacademic' pupils. Applicants will be expected to take part in the whole programme so we are not looking for particular subject specialists. Relevant experience is not necessary but enthusiasm is essential.

SHEFFIELD METROPOLITAN DISTRICT COUNCIL EDUCATION DEPARTMENT
SUPPORT TEACHERS for Emotionally Disturbed Children in Normal Schools—Scale 3.
Applications are invited for three TEACHERS to provide practical guidance and support in the education of emotionally disturbed children in normal schools.
The Education Committee is proposing to appoint three teachers for this purpose with one to be based in each of its day units for maladjusted children (i.e., Broad Elms and Deerlands) and the third in Dr John Worrall Day School for pupils who are ESN(M) and maladjusted.
Although based in those schools, and available as necessary to undertake some work within them, the principal responsibility of those three teachers will be to go, when requested to do so, to normal schools to give practical guidance and help to teachers who have emotionally disturbed children in their groups.
For this important new facility the Education Committee is looking for teachers with a real interest in, and practical experience of, meeting children's emotional, developmental and learning problems and the ability to co-operate with other disciplines in this work.
Forms of application, obtainable from the Chief Education Officer, should be returned to him at P.O. Box 67, Leopold Street, Sheffield S1 1RJ within 14 days of the appearance of this advertisement.
When returning forms, applicants are requested to state whether they desire to be considered for all of the three posts and, if not, which particular post or posts they desire to apply for.

ST. WILLIAM'S COMMUNITY HOME SCHOOL
MARKET WEIGHTON, YORK YO4 3HA

Applications are invited from male or female candidates, preferably of the Roman Catholic faith, for the following vacancies at this establishment which accommodates 84 boys, aged 12 to 16 years, in three separate House Units.

HOUSEWARDEN
£3,135 to £4,485 plus 5 per cent

Due to retirement, a unique opportunity exists for a suitably qualified and experienced candidate to lead and develop a mainly newly-appointed multi-disciplinary staff team of eight, and to build up the House Unit to its full complement of 28 boys from the present low occupancy. The successful candidate will be required to develop a warm and tolerant yet supportive and controlled atmosphere within the House Unit, and to provide imaginative leadership to the staff team so that a high standard of child care practice is achieved, and to undertake the full range of administrative and caring functions attached to such a post.

RESIDENTIAL SOCIAL WORKERS
£2,283 to £4,269 plus 5 per cent

Vacancies exist within two House teams. The successful candidates will be expected to develop supportive relationships with individual boys, and to assist the Housewarden in the range of duties outlined above. Common sense, maturity and a warm personality are the essential attributes for these posts, although it is hoped to appoint candidates who are qualified and have experience of working with adolescent boys in a residential setting. However, training opportunities do exist for unqualified staff.

Accommodation: Good accommodation exists for either married or single applicants at the standard rate.

REMEDIAL TEACHER—with enthusiasm and imagination who will work with an experienced team of dedicated educators and have an impact on the lives of children who usually have failed or underachieved in mainstream education. Our facilities are excellent, and in addition to specialisation in Remedial Education, we are looking for personal qualities, which would make a candidate an asset in this challenging and rewarding work.

Salary: Burnham 1 + allowances totalling £1,065. An allowance of £879 is paid for an average of 15 hours extraneous duty each week, during which the teachers join with Residential Social Work Staff in House Units to assist with boys' personal development and recreational activities.

One Scale Two post can be awarded and a semi-detached House may also be available to a successful married applicant at standard rates.

Informal visits are welcomed, and may be arranged by contacting the Headmaster, Brother James—06962 2218.

Application forms are available from: The Administrator, 110a Lawrence Street, York YO1 3EB.

EDUCATION SERVICE

Further Education/Schools

Professional Assistants (2)

£5,494.56-£6,056.56 inclusive plus [illegible] Award effective 1 July, 1978. PO1

We need two capable assistants to work with our team of Education Officers: one will be concerned primarily with Further Education and the other with Schools administration. Capability will not pre-suppose previous experience although a successful teaching background will be an advantage, as will a degree or other relevant professional qualification.

Casual Car Allowances are attached to these posts. Generous conditions of service include, in appropriate cases, disturbance and travelling allowance, leave and expenses in searching for accommodation and moving house, legal fees for house sale and purchase and lodging allowances.

Application forms and further particulars from Chief Education Officer, Somerset Road, London N17. Telephone 808 4500, ext. 103. Applications returnable by: 7th July, 1978.

Professional Assistant

£5,494 to £5,797

Required to undertake a wide range of duties in the Education Department. In the first instance, the man or woman appointed will work closely with the Assistant Controller (Schools Section) but, in due course, will be given an opportunity of gaining experience in other sections of the Department.

Candidates should hold a degree of a British University and have had good teaching experience. Some administrative experience is desirable but not essential. This post offers good career prospects and would interest a teacher wishing to enter education administration. Car Allowance payable.

Application form and further details from Assistant Controller (Manpower Services) (quoting reference TES/E24), London Borough of Harrow, PO Box 57, Civic Centre, Harrow, Middlesex HA1 2XF, returnable within fourteen days.

Cumbria Social Services

Addison-Wesley Publishers are looking for additional

Schools Representatives

We are a young, forward-looking company, part of an international publishing group, with a proven record of success in the educational market.

Expansion has created a need for further representatives throughout England and Wales, excluding Cumbria and the North East. Rather than define specific areas, we would prefer to arrange territories to suit candidates.

The successful applicants are unlikely to be over 30. They should be prepared to spend time away from the home base, and will live either in or near a major population centre.

Candidates should possess an outgoing personality, and be able to demonstrate a record of self-motivation either in business, professional, or social fields.

An interest in education, together with some teaching experience, is essential, as is the ability to discuss our material with senior educationalists, address groups in a lecture or workshop situation, and organise exhibitions.

We offer attractive rewards, including a Ford Cortina 2.0 GL Estate Car, and generous fringe benefits. These posts present a continual challenge and prospects for a varied and interesting career in educational publishing.

Please send full details of your career to date to:

Adult education

Parents' prep

hristopher Griffin-Beale

om its inception over two years , Granada's Parents' Day (Tues- ys 12.30) has had the consistent rit of directing itself single- ndedly to parents—unlike several evious television series about ucation which hovered uncer- inly between the needs of profes- nal educationists and an eaves- opping audience of parents. But e full potential of Granada's good entions was never quite realized the individual programmes.

However, the new series—delayed ill last month by an industrial pute at Granada—demonstrates new sense of attack, not least in oducer Arthur Taylor's decision bring in Eric Midwinter as the hor-person. Midwinter has long n a reliable interviewee for producers in need of a com- itted educationist who could com- unicate lucidly, but with a direct, pulist turn of phrase. He brings same qualities to his new role presenter, interviewer and com- tator—his description of an in- al infant school assembly as, hymns and prayers and a few wns" catches a mood precisely, lthough occasionally he threatens overdo the mateyness.

Midwinter has long been commit- d to the involvement of the com- nity in schools and it is rare to d a TV anchor-person who can bine such real authority and volvement in the subject with tural competence as a presenter.

The new series also owes its pact to the choice of subjects and e treatment they receive. Recent ogrammes have tackled the highly opical questions of school closures nd the range of information avail- ble to parents about their chil- ren's schools.

The new series started with two programmes about unemployment, ut not about the issue that currently transfixes so many profes- ional educationists—the relation- ship between schools and industry; mportant as that may be in the ong term, it hardly helps parents whose teenagers have already left chool—or are about to leave—with- ut much prospect of work.

Instead the programmes examined ome practical options, work experi- nce schemes and various training ourses. The programmes were posi- ve and encouraging, advising arents to bolster their children's orale.

Midwinter duly praised the "suc- ess stories" of two Merseyside oungsters who obtained permanent obs through their work experience, ut he also raised some awkward olitical questions about the 'pro- riety of providing firms with an asy way of selecting staff at the axpayer's expense, and about the eed to ensure the most disadvant- aged youngsters get a chance to benefit from the work experience scheme.

Next Tuesday's programme (12.30 13.00, ITV), "Welcome to School" maintains the same attack with an examination of parental involvement in schools through a dawn-to-dusk survey of a range of activities whereby various Coventry primary schools welcome parents in, from "a mother and baby self-help play group" to an after-school Monday Club where parents play games with children (unusually, fathers were heavily involved in this club).

Although Coventry's exemplary work on community education is closely connected with its multi-ethnic policy the programme perhaps wisely concentrates on Coventry's work with indigenous parents.

Midwinter and his studio interviewees—teacher/adviser Flo Robinson and community education organizer John Rennie—repeatedly stress the educational purpose of parental involvement. It helps the school to teach more effectively if the parents are both in close contact with their children's teachers and understand the school's practice—one Coventry school holds a reading workshop for parents who want to help their children learn to read.

But what can parents do about the many schools that are as difficult to enter as Fort Knox (as Midwinter typically puts it)? The programme wisely emphasizes the slowness of educational change—Flo Robinson recalls that the philosophy of parental involvement is not new to infant teaching, even if some of its current manifestations are. Secure change depends upon a change in attitudes. School can—and should—change, but parents eager for more involvement are advised to proceed slowly and with tact.

Teachers might usefully draw parents' attention to the programmes or even record them as a basis for discussion with parents.

Given the successful format, Midwinter's talents and the apparent commitment of greater resources for filming, it would be a pity if Granada could not carry the idea further, perhaps with a more topical approach, tackling parents' individual problems but drawing out the general issues and, as the unemployment programmes suggested, not confining attention to school alone—children in hospital might be another theme for a wider programme for parents. With Midwinter, such a programme might do more for educational consumers than That's Life does for other kinds of consumer—and without the show-biz tweeness that mars Ms Rantzen's efforts.

The accompanying book, "The Parents' Day School Book" by Jonathan Croall, was reviewed in the TES, April 28, 1978.

Ballet

Doves and angels

Michael Church

Experimental dance companies may complain about their lack of financial support, but in another crucial respect they have never had it so good: more and more people, especially in education and in local arts associations, are taking them seriously. They are admittedly taken far more seriously in America, but even here Feiffer's sardonic portrayals of the modern dancer-guru (whose inscrutable art is the answer to all the problems of the world) now strike a vibrant chord.

The BBC's recent dance month, which presented the watching millions with some of the best of the old world as well as the new, will have helped put things into perspective. London Weekend's fascinating programme on MacMillan's Mayerling, which was broadcast last Saturday, should have convinced anyone who saw it of the creative vigour now coursing through Covent Garden. Current events at the London Coliseum are an even more forceful reminder that, after swallowing Martha Graham whole, the classical tradition has now successfully digested her and is once more in a healthy state.

The Stuttgart Ballet, who have just done a London season, showed what absolute mastery looked like in practice, performing the variegated works in their somewhat uneven repertoire with an even brilliance. Two of their much acclaimed new narrative pieces seemed to me impossible to take seriously—a rhetorically doom-laden Hamlet for five dancers, and a Carmen (with fatal echoes of Bizet's score) of a quite galumphing ridiculousness. Cranko's full-length ballet Onegin, on the other hand, worked as well as Ashton's A Month in the Country (which is saying something) and in a similar choreographic idiom.

But it was our own Kenneth MacMillan who dominated the Stuttgart repertory. His newest work, My Brother, My Sisters, which here got its first London airing, is in that rather overheated vein which he has made his own—the psychological exploration of morbid adolescent sexuality. High marks for intricate technical inventiveness, low marks of aesthetic coherence. This same choreographer's Requiem, however, was a triumph, with the Stuttgart dancers giving a marvellous ensemble performance. Fauré's austere music and Yolanda Sonnabend's subtly Romanesque designs were beautifully echoed in the choreography. This, with its imagery of doves and angels, and its constant suggestion of inert terrestrial matter miraculously being raised to an ethereal state, was pervaded by a sense of religious ecstasy.

Eva Evdokimova in act two of "Giselle."

This time round, Stuttgart did not present Greening, an interesting work which Glen Tetley created for them, but oddly enough the London Festival Ballet used it to launch their own season, which finishes tomorrow. They are in fine form, though they have been notably and unanimously savaged by the critics for their current production of Scheherezade. While this is indeed a slightly tatty production, with crude and inappropriate modern choreographic interpolations, garish lighting, and with comic elements preponderating, the critical scorn is itself of some interest. One writer suggested that perhaps, like Petrushka, Scheherezade just did not work any more, which implies a curiously limiting view of the life of a work of art (as well as flying in the face of reality—the audience loved it).

Except when we are watching a play, a film, a ballet of absolute contemporaneity, we must always make a historical transposition in our minds: as with Ballet Rambert's authentic production of L'après-midi d'un faune Festival are rendering the world an inestimable service in keeping alive these great historic classics. Their production of Conservatoire, a ballet now over 100 years old is, though not rivetingly done, a further case in point. About Mary Skeaping's utterly beguiling resuscitation of Giselle, which seems fresher and more imbued with Gothic mystery every time one sees it, no more needs to be said.

Next week Festival are off to wow the Americans. They return to the Festival Hall for a three week season starting on August 25, and from October 23 onward they will tour Norwich, Bournemouth, Birmingham, Blackpool, Newcastle, Liverpool, Nottingham and Cardiff.

Summer break

ITV educational broadcasts have for the most part finished. However, like last year they will be broadcasting "summer break" programmes for an hour between June 26 and September 1. The programmes are repeats chosen mainly to reflect outside interests: painting, sailing, natural history, but could also be useful for use in the last week of term. History Round You, for example, is for junior viewers and encourages children to look for historical evidence to build up a picture of local history. A Present From the Past adopts a similar approach at an older level, concentrating particularly on industrial archeology. For further details see the TV Times.

Caring for Children
Colour, 30 minutes. 16mm.
Available free through the Church of England Children's Society, Old own Hall, Kennington Road, Lon- on SE11 4QD, or for hire from oncord Films or Religious Films td.

ring for Children is a well pro- uced, unsentimental film which ows some of the projects being n by the Church of England hildren's Society. In a welfare ate it is shameful that a charity as to provide such essential ser- ices as day care centre, children's omes and half-way houses for eenagers from institutions who are bout to launch themselves in the utside world.

There is such a heavy demand for e society's 12 day care centres at the trained staff who run them can only admit children under five who are in desperate need. These include handicapped children, those from single-parent families, children living in impossibly overcrowded conditions or those from non-English speaking backgrounds.

One young father whose children are now at the Cardiff centre shown in the film, had had to give up his job in order to look after his two children when his wife left home. He suffered periods of severe depression until his social worker finally persuaded him to put the children into day care.

Centres provide support for both parents and children. A mother admitted that she had come very close to injuring her over-active, unruly children, both under four, who had begun to threaten her marriage. With the help of the centre, she has managed to establish a loving relationship with them.

The residential home shown in the film aimed to be as informal as possible and to encourage the children to look after themselves so that they are able to cope when they leave the home. The half-way house project provides a vital link for many teenagers who have grown out of their homes or foster families and who want to be independent, but are not yet ready to live on their own. At the half-way houses they have their own bedsitting rooms, and latch keys so they can come and go as they please. They share a sitting room and kitchen and there is a resident social worker to whom they can turn for help and advice.

The film shows clearly the enormous contribution one dedicated charity is making to help those in our society who cannot find help elsewhere.

Digging it in the East End

Heather Neill

"This theatre still has something of a knees-up reputation." David Holman, ex-university teacher and veteran of TIE, was sitting in the dusty plush of the Theatre Royal, Stratford East. On stage was a realistic-looking Anderson shelter and the remains of a bombed house, the set for his play Dig for Victory which follows the fortunes of East End people between 1942 and the election of 1945 and shows their growing awareness of what they want from peace. "They learnt from the experience of making arms for the Russians and from meeting American soldiers."

The subject follows naturally from David Holman's TIE writing of which the best-known piece is No Pasaran, about racism.

There are four children from local schools ("absolute crackers", says Mr Holman) in Dig for Victory, another in the sequence of plays about growing up in the East End which are currently being staged at the Theatre Royal. David Holman has been invited to stay at Stratford for a year to write three more plays. He is already researching one on football apprentices and had spent the morning with the manager of West Ham. Several local clubs have opened their doors to him.

The "knees up" reputation intrigues him. This is a theatre which attracts a local audience who like to enjoy themselves, but that does not preclude the uncompromising treatment of serious subjects, as long as there is a direct connexion with the lives of ordinary people.
